

Uniform with the present volumes

MEMOIRS OF THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE 2 vols.

‘ SECRET MEMOIRS OF THE COURT OF LOUIS XIV
1 vol

SECRET MEMOIRS OF THE ROYAL FAMILY OF FRANCE. 2 vols

‘ THE PRIVATE MEMOIRS OF LOUIS XV 1 vol

THE SECRET HISTORY OF THE COURT OF BERLIN
2 vols.

THE SECRET HISTORY OF THE COURT AND CABINET
OF ST CLOUD 2 vols.

MEMOIRS OF MINE LA MARQUISE DE MONTESPAN
2 vols.

‘ SECRET MEMOIRS OF THE COURT OF ST PETERS
BURG 1 vol

MEMOIRS
OF
MARGARET DE VALOIS

Edition strictly limited to 500 copies

Five extra copies have been printed on Japanese vellum, but are not offered for sale

Marguerite de Valois
1<sup>re</sup> femme de Henri IV.

MEMOIRS

OF

MARGARET DE VALOIS

(QUEEN OF NAVARRE)

Containing the Secret History of the Court of France for Seventeen Years, viz., from 1565 to 1582, during the Reigns of Charles IX. and Henry III.

WRITTEN BY HERSLIE, IN A SERIES OF LETTERS

LONDON

H S NICHOLS & CO

3 SOHO SQUARE AND 62A PICCADILLY W

MDCCCXCV

Printed and Published by
H. R. NICHOLS AND CO
AT 3 MOHO SQUARE LONDON W

PUBLISHERS' NOTE

---

THIS the Ninth Work of the Court Memoir Series will, it is confidently anticipated, prove to be of an interest at least equal to that of any of its predecessors. These Letters first appeared in French, in 1628, just thirteen years after the death of their witty and beautiful Authoress, who, whether as the wife for many years of the Great Henry of France, or on account of her own charms and accomplishments, has always been the subject of romantic interest.

The Letters contain many particulars of nearly the first half of her life, i.e., up to her twenty-ninth year, together with many anecdotes hitherto unknown or forgotten, told with a saucy vivacity which is charming, and an air vividly recalling the sprightly, arch demeanour, and black, sparkling eyes of the fair Queen of Navarre. There remain, unfortunately, some thirty-four years of her life of which but little is known. She died in 1615, aged sixty-three.

These Letters, however, contain the Secret History of the Court of France during the seventeen eventful years 1565-82. They end seven years before the assassination by Clement of Henry III, the Queen's brother and, consequently, although they relate many particulars of the early part of the life of Henry IV they take in no part of his reign

The events however of the seventeen years referred to are of surpassing interest, including, as they do the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew the formation of the League, the Peace of Sens, and an account of the religious struggles which agitated that period They, besides, afford an instructive insight into royal life at the close of the sixteenth century, the modes of travelling then in vogue, manners and customs of the time, and a picturesque account of the city of Liège and its Sovereign Bishop

As has been already stated these Memoirs first appeared in French in 1628 They were, thirty years later printed in London in English and were again there translated and published in 1813 This last named translation is made use of for the present edition

LONDON, 12th August, 1895

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE

---

THE Memoirs, of which a new translation is now presented to the public, are the undoubted composition of the celebrated Princess whose name they bear, the contemporary of our Queen Elizabeth, of equal abilities with her, but of far unequal fortunes. Both Elizabeth and Margaret had been bred in the school of adversity, both profited by it, but Elizabeth had the fullest opportunity of displaying her acquirements in it. Queen Elizabeth met with trials and difficulties in the early part of her life, and closed a long and successful reign in the happy possession of the goodwill and love of her subjects. Queen Margaret, during her whole life, experienced little else besides mortification and disappointment, she was suspected and hated by both Protestants and Catholics, with the latter of whom, though, she invariably joined in communion, yet was she not in the least inclined to persecute or injure the former. Elizabeth amused herself with a number of suitors, but never submitted to the yoke of matrimony. Margaret, in compliance with the injunctions of the Queen her mother and King Charles her brother, married Henry, King of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France, for whom she had no inclination, and this union being followed by a mutual indifference and dislike, she readily consented to dissolve it soon after which event she saw a princess, more fruitful but less prudent, share the throne of her ancestors, of whom she was the only representative. Elizabeth was polluted with the blood of her cousin the Queen of Scots, widow of Margaret's eldest brother. Margaret saved many Huguenots from the massacre of Saint Bartholomew's Day, and according to Brantome, the life of the King her husband whose name was on the list of the proscribed. To close this parallel, Elizabeth began early to govern a kingdom which she ruled through the course of her long life with severity yet gloriously, and with success. Margaret, after the death of the Queen her mother and her brothers, though sole heiress of the House of Valois, was, by the Salic law excluded from all pretensions to the crown of France and though for the greater part of her life shut up in a castle, surrounded by rocks and mountains, she has not escaped the shafts of obloquy.

The Translator has added some notes, which give an account of such places as are mentioned in the Memoirs, taken from the itineraries of the time, but principally from the "Géographie Universelle of Vossien in which regard is had to the new division of France into departments, as well as to the ancient one of principalities, archbishoprics, bishoprics generalities, châtellenies, ballages, duchies seignories, &c.

In the composition of her Memoirs, Margaret has evidently adopted the epistolary form, though the work came out of the French Editor's hand divided into three (as they are styled) books these three books, or letters, the Translator has taken the liberty of subdividing into twenty-one, and, at the head of each of them, he has added a short table of the contents. This is the only liberty he has taken with the original Memoirs, the translation itself being as near as the present improved state of our language could be brought to approach the unpolished strength and masculine vigour of the French of the age of Henry IV.

This translation is styled a new one, because, after the Translator had made some progress in it, he found these Memoirs had already been made English, and printed, in London, in the year 1656, thirty years after the first edition of the French original. This translation has the following title "The grand Cabinet Counsels unlocked, or, the most faithful Transaction of Court Affairs, and Growth and Continuance of the Civil Wars in France, during the Reigns of Charles the last, Henry III. and Henry IV., commonly called the Great. Most excellently written, in the French Tongue, by Margaret de Valois, Sister to the two first Kings, and Wife of the last. Faithfully translated by Robert Codrington, Master of Arts," and again as "Memorials of Court Affairs," &c., Lond., 1658

The Memoirs of Queen Margaret contain the secret history of the Court of France during the space of seventeen years, from 1565 to 1582, and they end seven years before Henry III., her brother, fell by the hands of Clement, the monk, consequently, they take in no part of the reign of Henry IV. (as Mr. Codrington has asserted in his title-page), though they relate many particulars of the early part of his life.

Margaret's Memoirs include likewise the history nearly of the first half of her own life, or until she had reached the twenty ninth year of her age and as she died in 1616 at the age of sixty three years, there remain thirty four years of her life, of which little is known. In 1598, when she was forty five years old, her marriage with Henry was dissolved by mutual consent she declaring that she had no other wish than to give him content and preserve the peace of the kingdom making it her request according to Brantome, that the King would favour her with his protection, which, as her letter expresses, she hoped to enjoy during the rest of her life. Sully says she stipulated only for an establishment and the payment of her debts, which were granted. After Henry in 1610 had fallen a victim to the furious fanaticism of the monk, Ravalliac, she lived to see the kingdom brought into the greatest confusion by the bad government of the Queen Regent, Marie de Medici, who suffered herself to be directed by an Italian woman she had brought over with her, named Leonora Galligai. This woman marrying a Florentine, called Concini, afterwards made a marshal of France, they jointly ruled the kingdom and became so unpopular that the marshal was assassinated, and the wife, who had been qualified with the title of Marchioness d'Ancre, burnt for a witch. This happened about the time of Margaret's decease.

It has just before been mentioned how little has been handed down to these times respecting Queen Margaret's history. The latter part of her life, there is reason to believe, was wholly passed at a considerable distance from Court, in her retirement (so it is called, though it appears to have been rather her prison) at the castle of Usson. This castle, rendered famous by her long residence in it, has been demolished since the year 1634. It was built on a mountain, near a little town of the same name, in that part of France called Auvergne, which now constitutes part of the present Departments of the Upper Loire and Puy-de-Dôme, from a river and mountain so named. These Memoirs appear to have been composed in this retreat. Margaret amused herself likewise, in this solitude, in composing verses, and there are specimens still remaining of her poetry. These compositions she often set to music, and sang them herself, accompanying her voice with the lute, on which she played to perfection. Great part of her time was spent in the perusal of the Bible and books of piety, together with the works of the best authors she could procure. Brantome assures us that Margaret spoke the Latin tongue with purity and elegance; and it appears, from her Memoirs, that she had read Plutarch with attention.

Margaret has been said to have given in to the gallantries to which the Court of France was, during her time, but too much addicted; but, though the Translator is obliged to notice it, he is far from being inclined to give any credit to a romance entitled, "Le Divorce Satyrique, ou, les Amours de la Reyne Marguerite de Valois," which is written in the person of her husband, and bears on the title-page these initials, viz, D R H. Q. M., that is to say, "du Roi Henri

Quatre Marl. This work professes to give a relation of Margaret's conduct during her residence at the castle of Usson but it contains so many gross absurdities and indecencies that it is undeserving of attention, and appears to have been written by some bitter enemy, who has assumed the character of her husband to traduce her memory<sup>1</sup>

Messire Pierre de Bourdeille, Seigneur de Brantome, better known by the name of Brantome, wrote the Memoirs of his own times. He was brought up in the Court of France, and lived in it during the reigns of Margaret's father and brothers, dying at the advanced age of eighty or eighty four years, but in what year is not certainly known. He has given anecdotes<sup>2</sup> of the life of Margaret, written during her

1 Le Divorce Satyrique is said to have been written by Louisa Margaretta de Lorraine, Princess of Conti, who is likewise the reputed author of "The Amours of Henry IV" disguised under the name of Alcander. She was the daughter of the Duke de Guise, assassinated at Blois in 1588 and born the year her father died. She married Francis Prince de Conti, and was considered one of the most ingenious and accomplished persons belonging to the French Court in the age of Louis XIII. She was left a widow in 1614 and died in 1631.

2 The author of the "Tablettes de France," and "Anecdotes des Rois de France," thinks that Margaret alludes to Brantome's Anecdotes in the beginning of her first letter where she says "I should commend your work much more were I myself not so much praised in it." (According to the original Je louerois davantage votre oeuvre, si elle ne me louoit tant.) If so these letters were addressed to Brantome, and not to the Baron de la Chataigneraye, as mentioned in the Preface to the French Edition. In Letter I (page 9) mention is made of Madame de Dampierre, whom Margaret styles the aunt of the person the letter is addressed to. She was dame d'honneur or lady of the bed-chamber before-mentioned retreat, when she was, as he says ("fille unique maintenant restée, de la noble maison de France"), the only survivor of her illustrious house. Brantome praises her excellent beauty in a long string of laboured hyperboles. Ronsard, the Court poet, has done the same in a poem of considerable length, wherein he has exhausted the whole of his wit and fancy. From what they have said, we may collect that Margaret was graceful in her person and figure, and remarkably happy in her choice of dress and ornaments to set herself off to the most advantage; that her height was above the middle size, her shape easy, with that due proportion of plumpness which gives an appearance of majesty and comeliness. Her eyes were full, black and sparkling, she had bright, chestnut-coloured hair, and a complexion fresh and blooming. Her skin was delicately white, and her neck admirably well formed, and this so generally admired beauty the fashion of dress, in her time, admitted of being fully displayed.

Such was Queen Margaret, as she is portrayed, with the greatest luxuriance of colouring, by these authors. To her personal charms were added a readito the Queen of Henry III, and Brantome, speaking of her, calls her his aunt. Indeed, it is not a matter of any consequence to whom these Memoirs were addressed, it is, however, remarkable that Louis XIV used the same words to Boileau, after hearing him read his celebrated epistle upon the famous Passage of the Rhine, and yet Louis was no reader, and is not supposed to have adopted them from these Memoirs. The thought is, in reality, fine, but might easily suggest itself to any other. "Cela est beau," said the monarch, "et je vous louerois davantage, si vous m'aviez moins loué." (The poetry is excellent, and I should praise you more had you praised me less.)

---

ness of wit, an ease and gracefulness of speech, and great affability and courtesy of manners. This description of Queen Margaret cannot be dismissed without observing, if only for the sake of keeping the fashion of the present times with her sex in countenance, that, though she had hair as has been already described, becoming her and sufficiently ornamental in itself, yet she occasionally called in the aid of wigs. Brantome's words are "L'artifice de perruques bien gentiment façonnées." <sup>1</sup>

I shall conclude this Preface with a letter from Margaret to Brantome the first, he says, he received from her during her adversity (son adversité are his words) being as he expresses it, so ambitious (pré somptueux) as to have sent to enquire concerning her health as she was the daughter and sister of the Kings, his masters (D'avoir envoyé sçavoir de ses nouvelles, mais quoy elle estoit fille et sœur de mes roys.)

The letter here follows Par la souvenance que vous avez de moy (qui m'a esté bien moins nouvelle qu'agréable), je connois que vous avez bien conservé

---

<sup>1</sup> Ladies in the days of Ovid wore periwigs. That poet says to Corinna —

Nunc tibi captivos mittet Germania crines
Culta triumphatæ munere gentis eris.

(Wigs shall from captive Germany be sent Ths with such spoils your head you ornament.)

These, we may conclude, were flaxen, that being the prevailing coloured hair of the Germans at this day. The Translator has met with a further account of Margaret's head-dress, which describes her as wearing a velvet bonnet ornamented with pearls and diamonds, and surmounted with a plume of feathers.

l'affection qu'avez tousjours eue à nostre maison, à ce peu qui reste d'un miserable naufrage, qui en quelque estat qu'il puisse estre, sera tousjours disposé de vous servir, me sentant bien heureuse que la fortune n'ait pû effacer mon nom de la memoire de mes plus anciens amis, comme vous estes J'ay sçeu que, comme moi, vous avez choisi la vie tranquille, en la quelle j'estime heureux qui s'y peut maintenir, comme Dieu m'en a fait la grâce depuis cinq ans, m'ayant logée en une arche de salut, où les orages de ces troubles ne peuvent, Dieu mercy, me nuire, à la quelle s'il me reste quelque moyen de pouvoir servir à mes amis, et à vous particulièrement, vous m'y trouverez entierement disposée et accompagnée d'une bonne volonté." That is to say, "From the attention and regard you have shown me (which to me appears less strange than it is agreeable), I find you still preserve that attachment you have ever had to my family, in a recollection of these poor remains which have escaped its wreck. Such as I am, you will find me always ready to do you service, since I am so happy as to discover that my fortune has not been able to blot out my name from the memory of my oldest friends, of which number you are one. I have heard that, like me, you have chosen a life of retirement, which I esteem those happy who can enjoy, as God, out of His great mercy, has enabled me to do for these last five years, having placed me, during these times of trouble, in an ark of safety, out of the reach, God be thanked, of storms. If, in my present situation, I am able to serve my friends, and you more especially, I shall be found entirely disposed to it and with the greatest goodwill.

There is such an air of dignified majesty in the foregoing letter and, at the same time, such a spirit of genuine piety and resignation, that it cannot but give an exalted idea of Margaret's character who appears superior to ill fortune and great even in her distress. If, as I doubt not, the reader thinks the same, I shall not need to make an apology for concluding this Preface with it

The following Latin verses, or call them, if you please, epigram, are of the composition of Barclay, or Barclaius author of 'Argenis, &c.

Neither has George Buchanan been wanting in paying Margaret the tribute of some Latin verses. An epigram is to be found amongst his Latin poems. See p 407, ed. London 1686 See likewise pp 416 and 430.

DE MARGARETA VALESIA,

NAVARRÆ REGINA

O patria, O arces, O dulcia tecta parentum,
 Unde avus, unde pater, tres unde ex ordine fratres
 Sceptra tulere mei, mene O agnoscitis arces ?
 Illa ego sum, cui vos cunabula cara dedistis,
 Et patrio ingentem cultu jactastis alumnam,
 Stirpe Deas, et fronte Deas et sidera vultu
 Cum premerem, amborum spes ambitiosa procorum,
 Nunc conjux vidua, et vani cum nomine regni,
 Rupibus è nudis, longique è carcere montis
 Excedo Sed et hic causas infesta dolendi
 Disponit fortuna mihi, monstratque colendam
 Quæ mihi successit, quique, ah, de corpore nostro
 Debuit esse puer Nec jam contendere promptum
 Damnavit dudum miseram fecitque nocentem
 Cum tali certasse viro Jam credere divis
 Felicesque sequi juvat, et subscribere fato
 O dolor ! an potui victos inflectere vultus
 Despectosque orasse viros ? Ne credite, vivam
 Jamdudum perii, jamdudum extincta supersum,
 Et vivo, et morior toties, me funere longo
 Nempe mori decuit, quæ tot per secula clarum
 Induco tumulis suprema Valesia nomen

TRANSLATION

ON

MARGARET DE VALOIS,

QUEEN OF NAVARRE

Dear native land<sup>1</sup> and you, proud castles ! say (Where grandsire,<sup>1</sup> father,<sup>2</sup> and three brothers<sup>3</sup> lay,
 Who each, in turn, the crown imperial wore),

---

<sup>1</sup> Francis I

<sup>2</sup> Henry II

<sup>3</sup> Francis II, Charles IX and Henry III

Me will you own, your daughter whom you bore?
Me once your greatest boast and chiefest pride,
By Bourbon and Lorraine,<sup>1</sup> when sought a bride
Now widowed wife,<sup>2</sup> a queen without a throne, Midst rocks and mountains<sup>3</sup> wander I alone.
Nor yet hath Fortune vented all her spite,
But sets one up,<sup>4</sup> who now enjoys my right,
Points to the boy<sup>5</sup> who henceforth claims the throne
And crown, a son of mine should call his own,
But ah, alas! for me 'tis now too late<sup>6</sup>
To strive against Fortune and contend with Fate
Of those I alighted, can I beg relief?<sup>7</sup>
No—let me die the victim of my grief.
And can I then be justly said to live?
Dead in estate, do I then yet survive?
Last of the name, I carry to the grave
All the remains the House of Valois have.

---

Henry Duke of Guise, and Henry King of Navarre.

1 Alluding to her divorce from Henry IV

2 The castle of Usson.

3 Marie de Medici, whom Henry married after his divorce from Margaret.

4 Louis XIII., the son of Henry and his queen, Marie de Medici.

5 Alluding to the differences betwixt Margaret and Henry her husband.

7 This is said with allusion to the supposition that she was rather inclined to favour the suit of the Duke of Guise and reject Henry for a husband.

CONTENTS

---

Translator's Preface

PAGE
1X

LETTER I

Introduction — Anecdotes of Margaret's infancy — Endeavours used to convert her to the new religion—She is confirmed in Catholicism—The Court on a progress—A grand festivity suddenly interrupted—The confusion in consequence

1

LETTER II

Message from the Duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III, to King Charles his brother, and the Queen-mother—Her fondness for her children—Their interview—Anjou's eloquent harangue—The Queen-mother's character—Discourse of the Duke of Anjou with Margaret—She discovers her own importance—Engages to serve her brother Anjou—Is in high favour with the Queen-mother

13

LETTER III

Le Guast—His character—Anjou affects to be jealous of the Guises—Dissuades the Queen-mother from reposing confidence in Margaret—She loses the favour of the Queen-mother and falls sick—Anjou's hypocrisy—He introduces de Guise into Margaret's sick chamber—Margaret demanded in marriage by the King of Portugal—Made uneasy on that account—Contrives to relieve herself—The match with Portugal broken off

23

LETTER IV

Death of the Queen of Navarre—Margaret's marriage with her son, the King of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV of France—The preparations for that solemnization described—The circumstances which led to the massacre of the Huguenots on Saint Bartholomew's Day	PAGE 33
--	------------

LETTER V

The massacre of Saint Bartholomew's Day	43
--	----

LETTER VI

Henry Duke of Anjou elected King of Portugal leaves France—Huguenot plots to withdraw the Duke of Alençon and the King of Navarre from Court—Discovered and defeated by Margaret's vigilance—She draws up an eloquent defence, which her husband delivers before a Committee from the Court of Parliament—Alençon and her husband under a close arrest, regain their liberty by the death of Charles IX.	51
--	----

LETTER VII

Accession of Henry III.—A journey to Lyons—Margaret's faith in supernatural intelligence	57
--	----

LETTER VIII

What happened at Lyons	62
------------------------	----

LETTER IX

Fresh intrigues—Marriage of Henry III.—Bueil arrives at Court and narrowly escapes assassination	71
--	----

LETTER X

Bueil is sent from Court—Margaret's husband attacked with a fit of epilepsy—Her great care of him—Torigni dismissed from Margaret's service—The King of Navarre and the Duke of Alençon secretly leave the Court	81
--	----

CONTENTS

XXIII

LETTER XI

	PAGE
Queen Margaret under arrest—Attempt on Torigni's life—Her fortunate deliverance	92

LETTER XII

The Peace of Sens, betwixt Henry III and the Huguenots	100
--	-----

LETTER XIII

The League—War declared against the Huguenots—Queen Margaret sets out for Spa	112
---	-----

LETTER XIV

Description of Queen Margaret's equipage—Her journey to Liège described—She enters with success upon her mission—Striking instance of maternal duty and affection in a great lady—Disasters near the close of the journey	126
---	-----

LETTER XV

The City of Liège described—Affecting story of Mademoiselle de Tournon—Fatal effects of suppressed anguish of mind	149
--	-----

LETTER XVI

Queen Margaret, on her return from Liège, is in danger of being made a prisoner—She arrives, after some narrow escapes, at La Fère	159
--	-----

LETTER XVII

Good effects of Queen Margaret's negotiation in Flanders—She obtains leave to go to the King of Navarre, her husband, but her journey is delayed—Court intrigues and plots—The Duke of Alençon again put under arrest	178
---	-----

LETTER XVIII

The brothers reconciled—Alençon restored to his liberty	192
---	-----

LETTER XIX

The Duke of Alençon makes his escape from Court—Queen Margaret's fidelity put to a severe trial	PAGE 205
---	-------------

LETTER XX

Queen Margaret permitted to go to the King her husband—Is accompanied by the Queen mother—Margaret insulted by her husband's secretary—She harbours jealousy—Her attention to the King her husband during an indisposition—Their reconciliation—The war breaks out afresh—Affront received from Marshal de Blon	217
---	-----

LETTER XXI

Situation of affairs in Flanders—Peace brought about by Duke Alençon's negotiation—Marshal de Blon apologises for firing on Nérac—Henry desperately in love with Foeseuse—Queen Margaret discovers Foeseuse to be pregnant, which she denies—Foeseuse in labour—Margaret's generous behaviour to her—Margaret's return to Paris	236
---	-----

Alphabetical List of Places mentioned in the Memoirs with their Descriptions	255
--	-----

MEMOIRS

OF

MARGARET DE VALOIS

---

LETTER I

INTRODUCTION—ANECDOTES OF MARGARET'S INFANCY—ENDEAVOURS USED TO CONVERT HER TO THE NEW RELIGION—SHE IS CONFIRMED IN CATHOLICISM—THE COURT ON A PROGRESS—A GRAND FESTIVITY SUDDENLY INTERRUPTED—THE CONFUSION IN CONSEQUENCE.

I SHOULD commend your work much more were I myself less praised in it; but I am unwilling to do so, lest my praises should seem rather the effect of self-love than to be founded on reason and justice. I am fearful that, like Themistocles, I should appear to admire their eloquence the most who are most forward to praise me. It is the usual frailty of our sex to be fond of flattery.
I blame this in other women, and should wish not to be chargeable with it myself Yet I confess that I take a pride in being painted by the hand of so able a master, however flattering the likeness may be If I ever were possessed of the graces you have assigned to me, trouble and vexation render them no longer visible, and have even effaced them from my own recollection So that I view myself in your Memoirs and say with old Madame de Randan who not having consulted her glass since her husband's death on seeing her own face in the mirror of another lady, exclaimed, 'Who is this? Whatever my friends tell me when they see me now I am inclined to think proceeds from the partiality of their affection I am sure that you yourself, when you consider more impartially what you have said will be induced to believe, according to these lines of du Bellay—

"C'est chercher Rome en Rome, Et rien de Rome en Rome ne trouver"

(Tis to seek Rome, in Rome to go And Rome herself at Rome not know)

But as we read with pleasure the history of the Siege of Troy, the magnificence of Athens, and other splendid cities, which once flourished, but are now so entirely destroyed that scarcely the spot whereon they stood can be traced, so you please yourself with describing these excellencies of beauty which are no more, and which will be only discoverable in your writings.

If you had taken upon you to contrast Nature and Fortune, you could not have chosen a happier theme upon which to descant, for both have made a trial of their strength on the subject of your Memoirs. What Nature did, you had the evidence of your own eyes to vouch for, but what was done by Fortune, you only know from hearsay, and hearsay, I need not tell you, is liable to be influenced by ignorance or malice, and, therefore, not to be depended on. You will, for that reason, I make no doubt, be pleased to receive these Memoirs from the hand which is most interested in the truth of them.

I have been induced to undertake writing my Memoirs the more from five or six observations which I have had occasion to make upon your work, as you appear to have been misinformed respecting certain particulars. For example, in that part where mention is made of Pau, and of my journey in France likewise, there where you speak of the late Marshal de Biron, of Agen and of the sally of the Marquis de Camillac from that place.

These Memoirs might merit the honourable name of history from the truths contained in them, as I shall prefer truth to embellishment In fact, to embellish my story I have neither leisure nor ability I shall, therefore do no more than give a simple narration of events They are the labours of my evenings and will come to you an unformed mass, to receive its shape from your hands, or as a chaos on which you have already thrown light Mine is a history most assuredly worthy to come from a man of honour one who is a true French man, born of illustrious parents, brought up in the Court of the Kings my father and brothers, allied in blood and friendship to the most virtuous and accomplished women of our times, of which society I have had the good fortune to be the bond of union

I shall begin these Memoirs in the reign of Charles IX., and set out with the first remarkable event of my life which fell within my remembrance

Hereby I follow the example of geographical writers, who, having described the places within their knowledge, tell you that all beyond them are sandy deserts, countries without inhabitants, or seas never navigated. Thus I might say all prior to the commencement of these Memoirs was the barrenness of my infancy, when we can only be said to vegetate like plants, or live, like brutes, according to instinct, and not as human creatures, guided by reason. To those who had the direction of my earliest years I leave the task of relating the transactions of my infancy, if they find them as worthy of being recorded as the infantine exploits of Themistocles and Alexander; the one exposing himself to be trampled on by the horses of a charioteer, who would not stop them when requested to do so, and the other refusing to run a race unless kings were to enter the contest against him. Amongst suchlike memorable things might be related the answer I made the King my father, a short time before the fatal accident which deprived France of peace, and our family of its chief glory. I was then about four or five years of age, when the King, placing me on his knee, entered familiarly into chat with me. There were, in the same room playing and diverting themselves, the Prince of Joinville, since the great and unfortunate Duke of Guise, and the Marquis of Beaupréau, son of the Prince de la Roche sur Yon, who died in his fourteenth year and by whose death his country lost a youth of most promising talents. Amongst other discourse the King asked which of the two Princes that were before me I liked best. I replied 'The Marquis.' The King said 'Why so? he is not the handsomest.' The Prince of Joinville was fair, with light coloured hair and the Marquis de Beaupréau brown with dark hair. I answered 'Because he is the best behaved whilst the Prince is always making mischief, and will be master over everybody.'

This was a presage of what we have seen happen since when the whole Court was infected with heresy about the time of the Conference of Poissy. It was with great difficulty that I resisted and preserved myself from a change of religion at that time. Many ladies and lords belonging to Court strove to convert me to Huguenotism. The Duke of Anjou since King Henry III of France, then in his infancy, had been prevailed on to change his religion, and he often snatched my "Hours" out of my hand, and flung them into the fire, giving me Psalm Books and books of Huguenot prayers, insisting on my using them. I took the first opportunity to give them up to my governess, Madame de Curton, whom God, out of His mercy to me, caused to continue steadfast in the Catholic religion. She frequently took me to that pious, good man, the Cardinal de Tournon, who gave me good advice, and strengthened me in a perseverance in my religion, furnishing me with books and chaplets of beads in the room of those my brother Anjou took from me and burnt.

Many of my brother's most intimate friends had resolved on my ruin, and rated me severely upon my refusal to change, saying it proceeded from a childish obstinacy, that if I had the least understanding, and would listen, like other discreet persons, to the sermons that were preached, I should abjure my uncharitable bigotry, but I was, said they, as foolish as my governess. My brother Anjou added threats, and said the Queen my mother would give orders that I should be whipped. But this he said of his own head, for the Queen my mother did not, at that time, know of the errors he had embraced. As soon as it came to her knowledge she took him to task, and severely reprimanded his governors, insisting upon their correcting him, and instructing him in the holy and ancient religion of his forefathers from which she herself never swerved. When he used those menaces, as I have before related, I was a child of seven or eight years old, and at that tender age would reply to him. Well, get me whipped if you can. I will suffer whipping, and even death, rather than be damned.

I could furnish you with many other replies of the like kind, which gave proof of the early ripeness of my judgment and my courage. but I shall not trouble myself with such researches, choosing rather to begin these Memoirs at the time when I resided constantly with the Queen my mother.

Immediately after the Conference of Poissy, the civil wars commenced, and my brother Alençon, and myself on account of our youth were sent to Amboise, whither all the ladies of the country repaired to us. With them came your aunt,

Madame de Dampierre, who entered into a firm friendship with me, which was never interrupted until her death broke it off. There was likewise your cousin, the Duchess of Rais, who had the good fortune to hear there of the death of her brute of a husband, killed at the battle of Dreux. The husband I mean was the first she had, named M. d'Annebaut, who was unworthy to have for a wife so accomplished and charming a woman as your cousin. She and I were not then such intimate friends as we have become since, and shall ever remain. The reason was that, though older than I, she was yet young, and young girls seldom take much notice of children, whereas your aunt was of an age when women admire their innocence and engaging simplicity.

I remained at Amboise until the Queen my mother was ready to set out on her grand progress, at which time she sent for me to come to her Court, which I did not quit afterwards.

Of this progress I will not undertake to give you a description, being still so young that, though the whole is within my recollection, yet the particular passages of it appear to me but as a dream, and are now lost I leave this task to others, of riper years, as you were yourself. You can well remember the magnificence that was displayed everywhere, particularly at the baptism of my nephew, the Duke of Lorraine at Bar le Duc at the meeting of M and Madame of Savoy in the city of Lyons the interview at Bayonne betwixt my sister the Queen of Spain the Queen my mother and King Charles my brother In your account of this interview you would not forget to make mention of the noble entertainment given by the Queen my mother on an island, with the grand dances, and the form of the saloon which seemed appropriated by Nature for such a purpose it being a large meadow in the middle of the island in the shape of an oval surrounded on every side by tall spreading trees In this meadow the Queen my mother had disposed a circle of niches, each of them large enough to contain a table of twelve covers. At one end a platform was raised ascended by four steps formed of turf. Here Their Majesties were seated at a table under a lofty canopy The tables were all served by troops of shepherdesses dressed in cloth of gold and satin after the fashion of the different provinces of France These shepherdesses, during the passage of the superb boats from Bayonne to the island, were placed in separate bands, in a meadow on each side of the causeway, raised with turf, and whilst Their Majesties and the company were passing to the great saloon they danced. On their passage by water, the barges were followed by other boats, having on board vocal and instrumental musicians, habited like Nereids, singing and playing the whole time. After landing, the shepherdesses I have mentioned before received the company in separate troops, with songs and dances, after the fashion and accompanied by the music of the provinces they represented — the Poiterins playing on bagpipes, the Provençales on the viol and cymbal, the Burgundians and Champagners on the hautboy, bass viol, and tambourine, in like manner the Bretons and other provincialists. After the collation was served and the feast at an end, a large troop of musicians, habited like satyrs, was seen to come out of the opening of a rock, well lighted up, whilst nymphs were descending from the top in rich habits, who, as they came down, formed into a grand dance — when, lo!

fortune no longer favouring this brilliant festival, a sudden storm of rain came on, and all were glad to get off in the boats and make for town as fast as they could. The confusion in consequence of this precipitate retreat afforded as much matter to laugh at the next day as the splendour of the entertainment had excited admiration. In short the festivity of this day was not forgotten on one account or the other amidst the variety of the like nature which succeeded it in the course of this progress.

LETTER II

MESSAGE FROM THE DUKE OF ANJOU, AFTERWARDS HENRY III., TO KING CHARLES HIS BROTHER AND THE QUEEN-MOTHER — HER FONDNESS FOR HER CHILDREN — THEIR INTERVIEW — ANJOU'S ELOQUENT HARANGUE — THE QUEEN-MOTHER'S CHARACTER — DISCOURSE OF THE DUKE OF ANJOU WITH MARGARET — SHE DISCOVERS HER OWN IMPORTANCE — ENGAGES TO SERVE HER BROTHER ANJOU — IS IN HIGH FAVOUR WITH THE QUEEN-MOTHER.

AT the time my magnanimous brother Charles reigned over France, and some few years after our return from the grand progress mentioned in my last letter, the Huguenots having renewed the war, a gentleman, despatched from my brother Anjou (afterwards Henry III. of France), came to Paris to inform the King and the Queen my mother that the Huguenot army was reduced to such an extremity that he hoped in a few days to force them to give him battle. He added his earnest wish for the honour of seeing them at Tours before that happened, in case Fortune, envying him the glory he had already achieved at so early an age, should on the so much looked for day, after the good service he had done his religion and his King, crown the victory with his death, he might not have cause to regret leaving this world without the satisfaction of receiving their approbation of his conduct from their own mouths a satisfaction which would be more valuable in his opinion than the trophies he had gained by his two former victories

I leave to your own imagination to suggest to you the impression which such a message from a dearly beloved son made on the mind of a mother who doted on all her children and was always ready to sacrifice her own repose, nay, even her life for their happiness

She resolved immediately to set off and take the King with her She had, besides myself her usual small company of female attendants, together with Mesdames de Rais and de Sauve. She flew on the wings of maternal affection, and reached Tours in three days and a half A journey from Paris made with such precipitation, was not unattended with accidents and some inconveniences, of a nature to occasion much mirth and laughter. The poor Cardinal de Bourbon, who never quitted her, and whose temper of mind, strength of body, and habits of life were ill suited to encounter privations and hardships, suffered greatly from this rapid journey.

We found my brother Anjou at Plessis-les-Tours, with the principal officers of his army, who were the flower of the princes and nobles of France. In their presence he delivered a harangue to the King, giving a detail of his conduct in the execution of his charge, beginning from the time he left the Court. His discourse was framed with so much eloquence, and spoken so gracefully, that it was admired by all present. It appeared matter of astonishment that a youth of sixteen should reason with all the gravity and powers of an orator of ripe years. The comeliness of his person, which at all times pleads powerfully in favour of a speaker, was in him set off by the laurels obtained in two victories. In short, it was difficult to say which most contributed to make him the admiration of all his hearers in words the feelings of my mother on this occasion, who loved him above all her children, as it was for the painter to represent on canvas the grief of Iphigenia's father. Such an overflow of joy would have been discoverable in the looks and actions of any other woman, but she had her passions so much under the control of prudence and discretion that there was nothing to be perceived in her countenance, or gathered from her words, of what she felt inwardly in her mind. She was, indeed, a perfect mistress of herself and regulated her discourse and her actions by the rules of wisdom and sound policy, showing that a person of discretion does upon all occasions only what is proper to be done. She did not amuse herself on this occasion with listening to the praises which issued from every mouth and sanction them with her own approbation but selecting the chief points in the speech relative to the future conduct of the war, she laid them before the Princes and great lords to be deliberated upon in order to settle a plan of operations.

It is equally as impossible for me to describe

To arrange such a plan a delay of some days was requisite. During this interval the Queen my mother, walking in the park with some of the Princes, my brother Anjou begged me to take a turn or two with him in a retired walk. He then addressed me in the following words · “Dear sister, the nearness of blood, as well as our having been brought up together, naturally, as they ought, attach us to each other. You must already have discovered the partialty I have had for you above my brothers, and I think I have perceived the same in you for me. We have been hitherto led to this by nature, without deriving any other advantage from it than the sole pleasure of conversing together. So far might be well enough for our childhood, but now we are no longer children. You know the high situation in which, by the favour of God and our good mother the Queen, I am here placed. You may be assured that, as you are the person in the world whom I love and esteem the most, you will always be a partaker of my advancement. I know you are not wanting in wit and discretion, and I am sensible you have it in your power to do me service with the Queen our mother, and preserve me in my present employments. It is a great point obtained for me, always to stand well in her favour I am fearful that my absence may be prejudicial to that purpose and I must necessarily be at a distance from Court. Whilst I am away the King my brother is with her, and has it in his power to insinuate himself into her good graces. This I fear in the end, may be of disservice to me. The King my brother is growing older every day. He does not want for courage and though he now diverts himself with hunting he may grow ambitious, and choose rather to chase men than beasts in such a case I must resign to him my commission as his lieutenant. This would prove the greatest mortification that could happen to me, and I would even prefer death to it. Under such an apprehension I have considered of the means of prevention, and see none so feasible as having a confidential person about the Queen my mother who shall always be ready to espouse and support my cause. I know no one so proper for that purpose as yourself, who will be, I doubt not, as attentive to my interest as I should be myself. You have wit discretion and fidelity, which are all that are wanting provided you will be so kind as to undertake such a good office. In that case I shall have only to beg of you not to neglect attending her morning and evening, to be the first with her and the last to leave her. This will induce her to repose a confidence and open her mind to you. To make her the more ready to do this, I shall take every opportunity to commend your good sense and understanding, and to tell her that I shall take it kind in her to leave off treating you as a child, which, I shall say, will contribute to her own comfort and satisfaction. I am well convinced that she will listen to my advice. Do you speak to her with the same confidence as you do to me, and be assured that she will approve of it. It will conduce to your own happiness to obtain her favour. You may do yourself service whilst you are labouring for my interest; and you may rest satisfied that, after God, I shall think I owe all the good fortune which may befall me to yourself."

This was entirely a new kind of language to me. I had hitherto thought of nothing but amusements, of dancing, hunting and the like diversions; nay, I had never yet discovered any inclination of setting myself off to advantage by dress, and exciting an admiration of my person and figure. I had no ambition of any kind, and had been so strictly brought up under the Queen my mother that I scarcely durst speak before her and, if she chanced to turn her eyes towards me I trembled, for fear that I had done something to displease her. At the conclusion of my brother's harangue, I was half inclined to reply to him in the words of Moses, when he was spoken to from the burning bush "Who am I that I should go unto Pharaoh? Send I pray thee by the hand of him whom thou wilt send"

However his words inspired me with resolution and powers I did not think myself possessed of before. I had naturally a degree of courage, and, as soon as I recovered from my astonishment, I found I was quite an altered person. His address pleased me and wrought in me a confidence in myself, and I found I was become of more consequence than I had ever conceived I had been. Accordingly, I replied to him thus "Brother, if God grant me the power of speaking to the Queen our mother as I have the will to do, nothing can be wanting for your service, and you may expect to derive all the good you hope from it, and from my solicitude and attention for your interest. With respect to my undertaking such a matter for you, you will soon perceive that I shall sacrifice all the pleasures in this world to my watchfulness for your service. You may perfectly rely upon me, as there is no one that honours or regards you more than I do. Be well assured that I shall act for you with the Queen my mother as zealously as you would for yourself."

These sentiments were more strongly impressed upon my mind than the words I made use of were capable of conveying an idea of. This will appear more fully in my following letters.

As soon as we were returned from walking, the Queen my mother retired with me into her closet, and addressed the following words to me: "Your brother has been relating the conversation you have had together; he considers you no longer as a child, neither shall I. It will be a great comfort to me to converse with you as I would with your brother. For the future you will freely speak your mind, and have no apprehensions of taking too great a liberty, for it is what I wish. These words gave me a pleasure then which I am now unable to express. I felt a satisfaction and a joy which nothing before had ever caused me to feel. I now considered the pastimes of my childhood as vain amusements. I shunned the society of my former companions of the same age. I disliked dancing and hunting, which I thought beneath my attention. I strictly complied with her agreeable injunction, and never missed being with her at her rising in the morning and going to rest at night. She did me the honour, sometimes to hold me in conversation for two and three hours at a time. God was so gracious with me that I gave her great satisfaction and she thought she could not sufficiently praise me to those ladies who were about her. I spoke of my brother's affairs to her and he was constantly apprised by me of her sentiments and opinion so that he had every reason to suppose I was firmly attached to his interest.

LETTER III

LE GUAST—HIS CHARACTER—ANJOU AFFECTS TO BE JEALOUS OF THE GUISES—DISSUADES THE QUEEN-MOTHER FROM REPOSING CONFIDENCE IN MARGARET—SHE LOSES THE FAVOUR OF THE QUEEN-MOTHER AND FALLS SICK—ANJOU'S HYPOCRISY—HE INTRODUCES DE GUISE INTO MARGARET'S SICK CHAMBER—MARGARET DEMANDED IN MARRIAGE BY THE KING OF PORTUGAL—MADE UNEASY ON THAT ACCOUNT—CONTRIVES TO RELIEVE HERSELF—THE MATCH WITH PORTUGAL BROKEN OFF.

I CONTINUED to pass my time with the Queen my mother greatly to my satisfaction, until after the battle of Moncontour. By the same despatch that brought the news of this victory to the Court, my brother, who was ever desirous to be near the Queen my mother, wrote her word that he was about to lay siege to Saint-Jean d'Angely, and that it would be necessary that the King should be present whilst it was going on. She, more anxious to see him than he could be to have her near him, hastened to set out on the journey, taking me with her, and her customary train of attendants I likewise experienced great joy upon the occasion having no suspicion that any mischief awaited me I was still young and without experience, and I thought the happiness I enjoyed was always to continue, but the malice of Fortune prepared for me at this interview a reverse that I little expected, after the fidelity with which I had discharged the trust my brother had reposed in me

Soon after our last meeting it seems, my brother Anjou had taken le Guast to be near his person, who had ingratiated himself so far into his favour and confidence that he saw only with his eyes, and spoke but as he dictated. This evil disposed man whose whole life was one continued scene of wickedness, had perverted his mind and filled it with maxims of the most atrocious nature He advised him to have no regard but for his own interest neither to love or put trust in any one and not to promote the views or advantage of either brother or sister These and other maxims of the like nature drawn from the school of Machiavelli, he was continually suggesting to him. He had so frequently inculcated them that they were strongly impressed on his mind, inasmuch that, upon our arrival, when after the first compliments my mother began to open in my praise and express the attachment I had discovered for him, this was his reply, which he delivered with the utmost coldness: "He was well pleased," he said, "to have succeeded in the request he had made to me; but that prudence directed us not to continue to make use of the same expedients, for what was profitable at one time might not be so at another." She asked him why he made that observation. This question afforded the opportunity he wished for, of relating a story he had fabricated, purposely to ruin me with her.

He began with observing to her that I was grown very handsome, and that M. de Guise wished to marry me; that his uncles, too, were very desirous of such a match; and, if I should entertain a like passion for him, there would be danger of my discovering to him all she said to me; that she well knew the ambition of that house, and how ready they were, on all occasions, to circumvent ours. It would, therefore, be proper that she should not, for the future communicate any matter of State to me, but, by degrees, withdraw her confidence.

I discovered the evil effects proceeding from this pernicious advice on the very same evening. I remarked an unwillingness on her part to speak to me before my brother, and, as soon as she entered into discourse with him, she commanded me to go to bed. This command she repeated two or three times. I quitted her closet, and left them together in conversation, but as soon as he was gone, I returned and entreated her to let me know if I had been so unhappy as to have done anything through ignorance, which had given her offence. She was at first inclined to dissemble with me, but at length she said to me thus: "Daughter, your brother is prudent and cautious; you ought not to be displeased with him for what he does, and you must believe what I shall tell you is right and proper. She then related the conversation she had with my brother, as I have just written it, and she then ordered me never to speak to her in my brother's presence.

These words were like so many daggers plunged into my breast. In my disgrace, I experienced as much grief as I had before joy on being received into her favour and confidence. I did not omit to say everything to convince her of my entire ignorance of what my brother had told her. I said it was a matter I had never heard mentioned before, and that, had I known it, I should certainly have made her immediately acquainted with it. All I said was to no purpose; my brother's words had made the first impression, they were constantly present in her mind, and outweighed probability and truth. When I discovered this, I told her that I felt less uneasiness at being deprived of my happiness than I did joy when I had acquired it, for my brother had taken it from me, as he had given it. He had given it without reason; he had taken it away without cause. He had praised me for discretion and prudence when I did not merit it, and he suspected my fidelity on grounds wholly imaginary and fictitious. I concluded with assuring her that I should never forget my brother's behaviour on this occasion.

Hereupon she flew into a passion and commanded me not to make the least show of resentment at his behaviour. From that hour she gradually withdrew her favour from me. Her son became the god of her idolatry, at the shrine of whose will she sacrificed everything.

The grief which I inwardly felt was very great and overpowered all my faculties, until it wrought so far on my constitution as to contribute to my receiving the infection which then prevailed in the army. A few days after I fell sick of a raging fever, attended with purple spots, a malady which carried off numbers, and, amongst the rest, the two principal physicians belonging to the King and Queen Chappelain and Castelan. Indeed, few got over the disorder after being attacked with it.

In this extremity the Queen my mother, who partly guessed the cause of my illness omitted nothing that might serve to remove it and, without fear of consequences, visited me frequently. Her goodness contributed much to my recovery, but my brother's hypocrisy was sufficient to destroy all the benefit I received from her attention after having been guilty of so treacherous a proceeding. After he had proved so ungrateful to me, he came and sat at the foot of my bed from morning to night, and appeared as anxiously attentive as if we had been the most perfect friends. My mouth was shut up by the command I had received from the Queen our mother, so that I only answered his dissembled concern with sighs, like Burrus in the presence of Nero, when he was dying by the poison administered by the hands of that tyrant. The sighs, however, which I vented in my brother's presence might convince him that I attributed my sickness rather to his ill offices than to the prevailing contagion.

God had mercy on me, and supported me through this dangerous illness. After I had kept my bed a fortnight, the army changed its quarters, and I was conveyed away with it in a litter. At the end of each day's march, I found King Charles at the door of my quarters, ready, with the rest of the good gentlemen belonging to the Court, to carry my litter up to my bedside. In this manner I came to Angers from Saint-Jean d'Angely, sick in body, but more sick in mind. Here, to my misfortune, M. de Guise and his uncles had arrived before me This was a circumstance which gave my good brother great pleasure, as it afforded a colourable appearance to his story I soon discovered the advantage my brother would make of it to increase my already too great mortification for he came daily to see me and as constantly brought M de Guise into my chamber with him He pretended the sincerest regard for de Guise, and, to make him believe it, would take frequent opportunities of embracing him, crying out at the same time, 'Would to God you were my brother! This he often put in practice before me which M de Guise seemed not to comprehend but I who knew his malicious designs lost all patience, yet did not dare to reproach him with his hypocrisy

As soon as I was recovered a treaty was set on foot for a marriage betwixt the King of Portugal and me, an ambassador having been sent for that purpose The Queen my mother commanded me to prepare to give the ambassador an audience, which I did accordingly My brother had made her believe that I was averse to this marriage accordingly, she took me to task upon it and questioned me on the subject, expecting she should find some cause to be angry with me. I told her my will had always been guided by her own, and that whatever she thought right for me to do, I should do it. She answered me angrily, according as she had been wrought upon, that I did not speak the sentiments of my heart, for she well knew that the Cardinal de Lorraine had persuaded me into a promise of having his nephew. I begged her to forward this match with the King of Portugal, and I would convince her of my obedience to her commands. Every day some new matter was reported to incense her against me. All these were machinations worked up by the mind of le Guast. In short, I was constantly receiving some fresh mortification, so that I hardly passed a day in quiet. On one side, the King of Spain was using his utmost endeavours to break off the match with Portugal, and M. de Guise continuing at Court, furnished grounds for persecuting me on the other. Still, not a single person of the Guises ever mentioned a word to me on the subject; and it was well known that, for more than a twelvemonth, M de Guise had been paying his addresses to the Princess de Porcian, but the slow progress made in bringing this match to a conclusion was said to be owing to his designs upon me

As soon as I made this discovery I resolved to write to my sister, Madame de Lorraine who had a great influence in the House of Porcian begging her to use her endeavours to withdraw M de Guise from Court and make him conclude his match with the Princess laying open to her the plot which had been concerted to ruin the Guises and me She readily saw through it, came immediately to Court and concluded the match, which delivered me from the aspersions cast on my character, and convinced the Queen my mother that what I had told her was the real truth This at the same time stopped the mouths of my enemies and gave me some repose

At length the King of Spain unwilling that the King of Portugal should marry out of his family, broke off the treaty which had been entered upon for my marriage with him

LETTER IV

DEATH OF THE QUEEN OF NAVARRE—MARGARET'S MARRIAGE WITH HER SON, THE KING OF NAVARRE, AFTERWARDS HENRY IV. OF FRANCE—THE PREPARATIONS FOR THAT SOLEMNISATION DESCRIBED—THE CIRCUMSTANCES WHICH LED TO THE MASSACRE OF THE HUGUENOTS ON SAINT BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY.

SOME short time after this a marriage was projected betwixt the Prince of Navarre, now our renowned King Henry IV., and me.

The Queen my mother, as she sat at table, discoursed for a long time upon the subject with M. de Meru, the House of Montmorency having first proposed the match. After the Queen had risen from table, he told me she had commanded him to mention it to me. I replied that it was quite unnecessary as I had no will but her own; however, I should wish she would be pleased to remember that I was a Catholic, and that I should dislike to marry anyone of a contrary persuasion.

Soon after this the Queen sent for me to attend her in her closet. She there informed me that the Montmorencys had proposed this match to her, and that she was desirous to learn my sentiments upon it. I answered that my choice was governed by her pleasure and that I only begged her not to forget that I was a good Catholic.

This treaty was in negotiation for some time after this conversation, and was not finally settled until the arrival of the Queen of Navarre, his mother at Court, where she died soon after.

Whilst the Queen of Navarre lay on her death bed a circumstance happened of so whimsical a nature that, though it is not of consequence to merit a place in the history, may very well deserve to be related by me to you. Madame de Nevers whose oddities you well know, attended the Cardinal de Bourbon, Madame de Guise, the Princess of Condé her sisters and myself to the late Queen of Navarre's apartments, whither we all went to pay those last duties which her rank and our nearness of blood demanded of us. We found the Queen in bed with her curtains undrawn, the chamber not disposed with the pomp and ceremonies of our religion but after the simple manner of the Huguenots; that is to say, there were no priests, no Cross nor any holy water. We kept ourselves at some distance from the bed, but Madame de Nevers, whom you know the Queen hated more than any woman besides, and which she had shown both in speech and by actions—Madame de Nevers, I say, approached the bedside, and, to the great astonishment of all present, who well knew the enmity subsisting betwixt them, took the Queen's hand, with many low curtseys, and kissed it, after which, making another curtsey to the very ground, she retired and rejoined us.

A few months after the Queen's death, the Prince of Navarre, or rather, as he was then styled, the King, came to Paris in deep mourning, attended by eight hundred gentlemen, all in mourning habits. He was received with every honour by King Charles and the whole Court, and, in a few days after his arrival, our marriage was solemnised with all possible magnificence, the King of Navarre and his retinue putting off their mourning and dressing themselves in the most costly manner. The whole Court, too, was richly attired, all which you can better conceive than I am able to express For my own part, I was set out in a most royal manner I wore a crown on my head with the coët, or regal close gown of ermine, and I blazed in diamonds My blue coloured robe had a train to it of four ells in length which was supported by three Princesses A platform had been raised, some height from the ground which led from the Bishop's palace to the church of Notre Dame. It was hung with cloth of gold, and below it stood the people in throngs to view the procession, stifling with heat We were received at the church door by the Cardinal de Bourbon who officiated for that day and pronounced the nuptial benediction After this we proceeded on the same platform to the tribune which separates the nave from the choir where was a double staircase, one leading into the choir the other through the nave to the church door The king of Navarre passed by the latter and went out of church.

But fortune, which is ever changing, did not fail soon to disturb the felicity of this union This was occasioned by the wound received by the admiral, which had wrought the Huguenots up to a degree of desperation. The Queen my mother was reproached on that account in such terms by the elder Paudallan and some other principal Huguenots, that she began to apprehend some evil design. Monsieur de Guise and my brother the King of Poland, since Henry III. of France, gave it as their advice to be beforehand with the Huguenots. King Charles was of a contrary opinion. He had a great esteem for M. de Rochefoucauld, Teligny, la Nouë, and some other leading men of the same religion; and, as I have since heard him say, it was with the greatest difficulty he could be prevailed upon to give his consent, and not before he had been made to understand that his own life and the safety of his kingdom depended upon it.

The King having learned that Maurevel had made an attempt upon the admiral's life, by firing a pistol at him through a window, in which attempt he failed, having wounded the admiral only in the shoulder, and supposing that Maurevel had done this at the instance of M. de Guise, to revenge the death of his father, whom the admiral had caused to be killed in the same manner by Poltrot, he was so much incensed against M de Guise that he declared with an oath that he would make an example of him and indeed the King would have put M de Guise under an arrest, if he had not kept out of his sight the whole day. The Queen my mother used every argument to convince King Charles that what had been done was for the good of the State, and this because, as I observed before, the King had so great a regard for the admiral la Nouë and Teligny on account of their bravery being himself a prince of a gallant and noble spirit and esteeming others in whom he found a similar disposition. Moreover these designing men had insinuated themselves into the Kings favour by proposing an expedition to Flanders with a view of extending his dominions and aggrandising his power propositions which they well knew would secure to themselves an influence over his royal and generous mind.

Upon this occasion the Queen my mother represented to the King that the attempt of M de Guise upon the admiral's life was ex cusable in a son who, being denied justice, had no other means of avenging his father's death. Moreover, the admiral, she said, had deprived her by assassination, during his minority and her regency, of a faithful servant in the person of Charri, commander of the King's body-guard, which rendered him deserving of the like treatment.

Notwithstanding that the Queen my mother spoke thus to the King, discovering by her expressions and in her looks all the grief which she inwardly felt on the recollection of the loss of persons who had been useful to her, yet, so much was King Charles inclined to save those who, as he thought, would one day be serviceable to him, that he still persisted in his determination to punish M. de Guise, for whom he ordered strict search to be made.

At length Pardaillan, disclosing by his menaces, during the supper of the Queen my mother, the evil intentions of the Huguenots, she plainly perceived that things were brought to so near a crisis, that, unless steps were taken that very night to prevent it, the King and herself were in danger of being assassinated She, therefore, came to the resolution of declaring to King Charles his real situation For this purpose she thought of the Marshal de Rais as the most proper person to break the matter to the King, the marshal being greatly in his favour and confidence.

Accordingly the marshal went to the King in his closet between the hours of nine and ten, and told him he was come as a faithful servant to discharge his duty, and lay before him the danger in which he stood, if he persisted in his resolution of punishing M de Guise, as he ought now to be informed that the attempt made upon the admiral's life was not set on foot by him alone, but that his (the King's) brother the King of Poland, and the Queen his mother had their shares in it that he must be sensible how much the Queen lamented Charri's assassination, for which she had great reason, having very few servants about her upon whom she could rely, and as it happened during the King's minority at the time moreover when France was divided between the Catholics and the Huguenots, M de Guise, being at the head of the former,

and the Prince of Condé of the latter, both alike striving to deprive him of his crown that, through Providence, both his crown and kingdom had been preserved by the prudence and good conduct of the Queen Regent, who, in this extremity, found herself powerfully aided by the said Charri, for which reason she had vowed to avenge his death: that, as to the admiral, he must be ever considered as dangerous to the State, and whatever show he might make of affection for His Majesty's person, and zeal for his service in Flanders, they must be considered as mere pretences, which he used to cover his real design of reducing the kingdom to a state of confusion.

The marshal concluded with observing that the original intention had been to make away with the admiral only, as the most obnoxious man in the kingdom, but Maurevel having been so unfortunate as to fail in his attempt, and the Huguenots becoming desperate enough to resolve to take up arms, with design to attack, not only M. de Guise, but the Queen his mother, and his brother the King of Poland, supposing them, as well as

His Majesty, to have commanded Maurevel to make his attempt he saw nothing but cause of alarm for His Majesty's safety as well on the part of the Catholics, if he persisted in his resolution to punish M de Guise as of the Huguenots, for the reasons which he had just laid before him

LETTER V

THE MASSACRE OF SAINT BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY.

KING CHARLES, a prince of great prudence, always paying a particular deference to his mother, and being much attached to the Catholic religion, now convinced of the intentions of the Huguenots, adopted a sudden resolution of following his mother's counsel, and putting himself under the safeguard of the Catholics. It was not, however, without extreme regret that he found he had it not in his power to save Teligny, la Noue, and M. de la Rochefoucauld.

He went to the apartments of the Queen his mother, and sending for M. de Guise and all the Princes and Catholic officers, the "Massacre of Saint Bartholomew" was that night resolved upon.

Immediately every hand was at work; chains were drawn across the streets, the alarm bells were sounded, and every man repaired to his post, according to the orders he had received, whether it was to attack the admirals quarters, or those of the other Huguenots M de Guise hastened to the admirals and Besme, a gentleman in the service of the former, a German by birth, forced into his chamber, and having slain him with a dagger, threw his body out of a window to his master

I was perfectly ignorant of what was going forward. I observed every one to be in motion, the Huguenots driven to despair by the attack upon the admirals life, and the Guises fearing they should not have justice done them, whispering all they met in the ear

The Huguenots were suspicious of me because I was a Catholic and the Catholics because I was married to the King of Navarre who was a Huguenot This being the case, no one spoke a syllable of the matter to me.

At night when I went into the bed chamber of the Queen my mother, I placed myself on a coffer next my sister Lorraine, who I could not but remark appeared greatly cast down The Queen my mother was in conversation with someone, but, as soon as she espied me, she bade me go to bed. As I was taking leave, my sister seized me by the hand and stopped me, at the same time shedding a flood of tears "For the love of God," cried she, "do not stir out of this chamber!" I was greatly alarmed at this exclamation; which the Queen my mother perceiving, called my sister to her, and chid her very severely. My sister replied it was sending me away to be sacrificed, for, if any discovery should be made, I should be the first victim of their revenge. The Queen my mother made answer that, if it pleased God, I should receive no hurt, but it was necessary I should go, to prevent the suspicion that might arise from my staying.

I perceived there was something on foot which I was not to know, but what it was I could not make out from anything they said.

The Queen again bade me go to bed in a peremptory tone. My sister wished me a good night, her tears flowing apace, but she did not dare to say a word more, and I left the bed-chamber more dead than alive.

As soon as I reached my own closet, I threw myself upon my knees and prayed to God to take me into His protection and save me but from whom or what I was ignorant Hereupon the King my husband who was already in bed, sent for me. I went to him, and found the bed surrounded by thirty or forty Huguenots, who were entirely unknown to me for I had been then but a very short time married. Their whole discourse, during the night was upon what had happened to the admiral and they all came to a resolution of the next day demanding justice of the King against M de Guise and, if it was refused, to take it themselves.

For my part I was unable to sleep a wink the whole night, for thinking of my sister's tears and distress, which had greatly alarmed me although I had not the least knowledge of the real cause As soon as day broke, the King my husband said he would rise and play at tennis until King Charles was risen, when he would go to him immediately and demand justice He left the bed-chamber, and all his gentlemen followed.

As soon as I beheld it was broad day I apprehended all the danger my sister had spoken of was over, and being inclined to sleep I bade my nurse make the door fast, and I applied myself to take some repose. In about an hour I was awakened by a violent noise at the door, made with both hands and feet, and a voice calling out, "Navarre! Navarre!" My nurse, supposing the King my husband to be at the door, hastened to open it, when a gentleman, named M. de Teian, ran in, and threw himself immediately upon my bed. He had received a wound in his arm from a sword, and another by a pike, and was then pursued by four archers, who followed him into the bed-chamber. Perceiving these last, I jumped out of bed, and the poor gentleman after me, holding me fast by the waist. I did not then know him, neither was I sure that he came to do me no harm; or whether the archers were in pursuit of him or me. In this situation I screamed aloud, and he cried out likewise, for our fright was mutual. At length, by God's providence, M. de Nancay, captain of the guard, came into the bed-chamber, and, seeing me thus surrounded, though he could not help pitying me, he was scarcely able to refrain from laughter. However, he reprimanded the archers very severely for their indiscretion, and drove them out of the chamber. At my request he granted the poor gentleman his life, and I had him put to bed in my closet, caused his wounds to be dressed, and did not suffer him to quit my apartment until he was perfectly cured. I changed my shift, because it was stained with the blood of this man, and, whilst I was doing so de Nancay gave me an account of the transactions of the foregoing night, assuring me that the King my husband was safe, and actually at that moment in the King's bed chamber. He made me muffle myself up in a cloak, and conducted me to the apartment of my sister, Madame de Lorraine whilst I arrived more than half dead. As we passed through the ante-chamber, all the doors of which were wide open, a gentleman of the name of Bourse pursued by archers was run through the body with a pike and fell dead at my feet. As if I had been killed by the same stroke, I fell, and was caught by M de Nancay before I reached the ground. As soon as I recovered from this fainting fit, I went into my sister's bed-chamber and was immediately followed by M de Miolano, first gentleman to the King

my husband, and Armagnac, his first valet de chambre, who both came to beg me to save their lives. I went and threw myself on my knees before the King and the Queen my mother, and obtained the lives of both of them.

Five or six days afterwards, those who were engaged in this plot, considering that it was incomplete whilst the King my husband and the Prince of Condé remained alive, as their design was not only to dispose of the Huguenots, but of the princes of the blood likewise; and knowing that no attempt could be made on my husband whilst I continued to be his wife, devised a scheme which they suggested to the Queen my mother for divorcing me from him. Accordingly, one holiday, when I waited upon her to chapel, she charged me to declare to her, upon my oath, whether I believed my husband to be like other men; "Because," said she, "if he is not, I can easily procure you a divorce from him." I begged her to believe that I was not sufficiently competent to answer such a question, and could only reply, as the Roman lady did to her husband, when he chid her for not informing him of his stinking breath, that never having approached any other man near enough to know a difference, she thought all men had been alike in that respect 'But, said I, 'madam since you have put the question to me, I can only declare I am content to remain as I am and thus I said because I suspected the design of separating me from my husband was in order to work some mischief against him

LETTER VI

HENRY DUKE OF ANJOU, ELECTED KING OF POLAND, LEAVES FRANCE—HUGUENOT PLOTS TO WITHDRAW THE DUKE OF ALENÇON AND THE KING OF NAVARRE FROM COURT—DISCOVERED AND DEFEATED BY MARGARET'S VIGILANCE—SHE DRAWS UP AN ELOQUENT DEFENCE, WHICH HER HUSBAND DELIVERS BEFORE A COMMITTEE FROM THE COURT OF PARLIAMENT—ALENÇON AND HER HUSBAND UNDER A CLOSE ARREST, REGAIN THEIR LIBERTY BY THE DEATH OF CHARLES IX.

WE accompanied the King of Poland as far as Beaumont. For some months before he quitted France, he had used every endeavour to efface from my mind the ill offices he had so ungratefully done me. He solicited to obtain the same place in my esteem which he held during our infancy; and, on taking leave of me, made me confirm it by oaths and promises. His departure from France, and King Charles's sickness, which happened just about the same time, excited the spirit of the two factions into which the kingdom was divided, to form a variety of plots. The Huguenots, on the death of the admiral, had obtained from the King my husband, and my brother Alençon, a written obligation to avenge it. Before Saint Bartholomew's Day they had gained my brother over to their party, by the hope of securing Flanders for him. They now persuaded my husband and him to leave the King and Queen on their return and pass into Champagne, there to join some troops which were in waiting to receive them.

M. de Miossans, a Catholic gentleman having received an intimation of this design, considered it so prejudicial to the interests of the King his master that he communicated it to me with the intention of frustrating a plot of so much danger to themselves and to the State. I went immediately to the King and the Queen my mother and informed them that I had a matter of the utmost importance to lay before them, but that I could not declare it unless they would be pleased to promise me that no harm should ensue from it to such as I should name to them, and that they would put a stop to what was going forward without publishing their knowledge of it. Having obtained my request I told them that my brother

Alençon and the King my husband had an intention, on the very next day, of joining some Huguenot troops, which expected them, in order to fulfil the engagement they had made upon the admiral's death, and for this their intention, I begged they might be excused, and that they might be prevented from going away without any discovery being made that their designs had been found out. All this was granted me, and measures were so prudently taken to stay them, that they had not the least suspicion that their intended evasion was known. Soon after we arrived at Saint-Germains, where we stayed some time, on account of the King's indisposition. All this while my brother Alençon used every means he could devise to ingratiate himself with me, until at last I promised him my friendship, as I had before done to my brother, the King of Poland. As he had been brought up at a distance from Court, we had hitherto known very little of each other, and kept ourselves at a distance. Now that he had made the first advances, in so respectful and affectionate a manner, I resolved to receive him into a firm friendship, and to interest myself in whatever concerned him without prejudice, how ever to the interests of my good brother, King Charles whom I loved more than anyone besides, and who continued to entertain a great regard for me of which he gave me proofs as long as he lived.

Meanwhile King Charles was daily growing worse, and the Huguenots constantly forming new plots. They were very desirous to get my brother the Duke of Alençon and the King my husband away from Court. I got intelligence, from time to time of their designs and providentially, the Queen my mother defeated their intentions when a day had been fixed on for the arrival of the Huguenot troops at Saint Germain. To avoid this visit we set off the night before for Paris two hours after midnight putting King Charles in a litter, and the Queen my mother taking my brother and the King my husband with her in her own carriage.

They did not experience on this occasion such mild treatment as they had hitherto done, for the King going to the Wood of Vincennes, they were not permitted to set foot out of the palace. This misunderstanding was so far from being mitigated by time, that the mistrust and discontent were continually increasing, owing to the insinuations and bad advice offered to the King by those who wished the ruin and downfall of our house. To such a height had these jealousies risen that the Marshals Montmorency and de Cossè were put under a close arrest, and la Mole and the Count de Donas executed. Matters were now arrived at such a pitch that commissioners were appointed from the Court of Parliament to hear and determine upon the case of my brother and the King my husband

My husband, having no counsellor to assist him, desired me to draw up his defence in such a manner that he might not implicate any person, and, at the same time, clear my brother and himself from any criminality of conduct. With God's help I accomplished this task to his great satisfaction, and to the surprise of the commissioners, who did not expect to find them so well prepared to justify themselves.

As it was apprehended, after the death of la Mole and the Count de Donas, that their lives were likewise in danger, I had resolved to save them at the hazard of my own ruin with the king, whose favour I entirely enjoyed at that time. I was suffered to pass to and from them in my coach with my women, who were not even required by the guard to unmask, nor was my coach ever searched. Thus being the case, I had intended to convey away one of them disguised in a female habit. But the difficulty lay in settling betwixt themselves which should remain behind in prison they being closely watched by their guards and the escape of one bring the other's life into hazard. Thus they could never agree upon the point, each of them wishing to be the person I should deliver from confinement.

But Providence put a period to their imprisonment by a means which proved very unfortunate for me. This was no other than the death of king Charles, who was the only stay and support of my life a brother from whose hands I never received anything but good who, during the persecution I underwent at Angers through my brother Anjou assisted me with all his advice and credit. In a word, when I lost king Charles, I lost everything

LETTER VII

ACCESSION OF HENRY III. — A JOURNEY TO LYONS —
MARGARET'S FAITH IN SUPERNATURAL INTELLIGENCE

AFTER this fatal event, which was as unfortunate for France as for me, we went to Lyons to give the meeting to the King of Poland, now Henry III. of France. The new King was as much governed by le Guast as ever, and had left this intriguing, mischievous man behind in France to keep his party together. Through this man's insinuations he had conceived the most confirmed jealousy of my brother Alençon. He suspected that I was the bond that connected the King my husband and my brother, and that, to dissolve their union, it would be necessary to create a coolness between me and my husband, and to work up a quarrel of rivalry betwixt them both by means of Madame de Sauve, whom they both visited. This abominable plot, which proved the source of so much disquietude and unhappiness, as well to my brother as myself, was as artfully conducted as it was wickedly designed

Many have held that God has great personages more immediately under His protection, and that minds of superior excellence have bestowed on them a good genius, or secret intelligencer, to apprise them of good or warn them against evil. Of this number I might reckon the Queen my mother, who has had frequent intimations of the kind particularly the very night before the tournament which proved so fatal to the King my father, she dreamed that she saw him wounded in the eye, as it really happened upon which she awoke, and begged him not to run a course that day, but content himself with looking on Fate prevented the nation from enjoying so much happiness as it would have done had he followed her advice. Whenever she lost a child, she beheld a bright flame shining before her and would immediately cry out, "God save my children! well knowing it was the harbinger of the death of some one of them which melancholy news was sure to be confirmed very shortly after During her very dangerous illness at Metz, where she caught a pestilential fever, either from the coal fires, or by visiting some of the nunneries which had been infected, and from which she was restored to health and to the kingdom through the great skill and experience of that modern Æsculapius, M. de Castillan, her physician—I say, during that illness, her bed being surrounded by my brother King Charles, my brother and sister Lorraine, several members of the Council, besides many ladies and Princesses, not choosing to quit her, though without hopes of her life, she was heard to cry out, as if she saw the battle of Jarnac “There! see how they flee! My son, follow them to victory! Ah, my son falls! O my God, save him! See there! the Prince of Condé is dead!” All who were present looked upon these words as proceeding from her delirium, as she knew that my brother Anjou was on the point of giving battle, and thought no more of it. On the night following, M. de Losses brought the news of the battle; and, it being supposed that she would be pleased to hear of it, she was awakened, at which she appeared to be angry, saying. “Did I not know it yesterday?” It was then that those about her recollected what I have now related, and concluded that it was no delirium but one of those revelations made by God to great and illustrious persons. Ancient history furnishes many examples of the like kind amongst the pagans, as the apparition of Brutus and many others, which I shall not mention it not being my intention to illustrate these Memoirs with such narratives, but only to relate the truth and that with as much expedition as I am able, that you may be the sooner in possession of my story

I am far from supposing that I am worthy of these divine admonitions nevertheless, I should accuse myself of ingratitude towards my God for the benefits I have received which I esteem myself obliged to acknowledge whilst I live and I further believe myself bound to bear testimony of His goodness and power, and the mercies He hath shown me, so that I can declare no extraordinary accident ever befel me whether fortunate or otherwise, but I received some warning of it, either by dream or in some other way so that I may say with the poet—

De mon bien on mon mal

Mon esprit m'est oracle."

(Whatever of good or ill befell

My mind was oracle to tell.)

And of this I had a convincing proof on the arrival of the King of Poland, when the Queen my mother went to meet him. Amidst the embraces and compliments of welcome in that warm season, crowded as we were together and stifling with heat, I found a universal shivering come over me, which was plainly perceived by those near me. It was with difficulty I could conceal what I felt when the King, having saluted the Queen my mother, came forward to salute me. This secret intimation of what was to happen hereafter made a strong impression on my mind at the moment, and I thought of it shortly after, when I discovered that the King had conceived a hatred of me through the malicious suggestions of le Guast, who had made him believe, since the King's death, that I espoused my brother Alençon's party during his absence, and cemented a friendship betwixt the King my husband and him

LETTER VIII

WHAT HAPPENED AT LYONS

AN opportunity was diligently sought by my enemies to effect their design of bringing about a misunderstanding betwixt my brother Alençon, the King my husband and me, by creating a jealousy of me in my husband, and in my brother and husband on account of their mutual love for Madame de Sanve.

One afternoon, the Queen my mother having retired to her closet to finish some despatches which were likely to detain her there for some time, Madame de Nevers your kinswoman, Madame de Rais another of your relations Bourdeille and Surgères asked me whether I would not wish to see a little of the city Whereupon Mademoiselle de Montigny the niece of Madame Usez, observing to us that the Abbey of Saint Peter was a beautiful convent we all resolved to visit it She then begged to go with us as she said she had an aunt in that convent, and as it was not easy to gain admission into it, except in the company of persons of distinction. Accordingly, she went with us, and there being six of us, the carriage was crowded. Over and above those I have mentioned, there was Madame de Curton, the lady of my bed-chamber, who always attended me. Liancourt, first esquire to the King, and Camille placed themselves on the steps of Torigni's carriage, supporting themselves as well as they were able, making themselves merry on the occasion, and saying they would go and see the handsome nuns too. I look upon it as ordered by Divine Providence that I should have Mademoiselle de Montigny with me, who was not well acquainted with any lady of the company, and that the two gentlemen just mentioned, who were in the confidence of King Henry, should likewise be of the party, as they were able to clear me of the calumny intended to be fixed upon me.

Whilst we were viewing the convent, my carriage waited for us in the square. In the square many gentlemen belonging to the Court had their lodgings. My carriage was easily to be distinguished, as it was gilt and lined with yellow velvet trimmed with silver We had not come out of the convent when the King passed through the square on his way to see Onelus, who was then sick. He had with him the King my husband, D O—— and the fat fellow Ruffé

The King, observing no one in my carriage, turned to my husband and said "There is your wife's coach and that is the house where Bidé lodges. Bidé is sick, and I will engage my word she is gone upon a visit to him Go," said he to Ruffé, 'and see whether she is not there. In saying this, the King addressed himself to a proper tool for his malicious purpose for this fellow Ruffé was entirely devoted to le Gnast I need not tell you he did not find me there however, knowing the King's intention, he, to favour it said loud enough for the King my husband to hear him

The birds have been there, but they are now flown This furnished sufficient matter for conversation until they reached home.

Upon this occasion, the King my husband displayed all the good sense and generosity of temper for which he is remarkable. He saw through the design and he despised the maliciousness of it

The King my brother was anxious to see the Queen my mother before me, to whom he imparted the pretended discovery, and she, whether to please a son on whom she doted, or whether she really gave credit to the story, had related it to some ladies with much seeming anger.

Soon afterwards I returned with the ladies who had accompanied me to Saint Peter's, entirely ignorant of what had happened. I found the King my husband in our apartments, who began to laugh on seeing me, and said. "Go immediately to the Queen your mother, but I promise you you will not return very well pleased." I asked him the reason, and what had happened. He answered. "I shall tell you nothing; but be assured of this, that I do not give the least credit to the story, which I plainly perceive to be fabricated in order to stir up a difference betwixt us two, and break off the friendly intercourse between your brother and me."

Finding I could get no further information on the subject from him, I went to the apartment of the Queen my mother. I met M. de Guise in the ante-chamber, who was not displeased at the prospect of a dissension in our family, hoping that he might make some advantage of it. He addressed me in these words. "I waited here expecting to see you, in order to inform you that some ill office has been done you with the Queen." He then told me the story he had learned of D O——, who, being intimate with your kinswoman had informed M de Guise of it that he might apprise us.

I went into the Queen's bed-chamber but did not find my mother there. However, I saw Madame de Nemours, the rest of the Princesses and other ladies, who all exclaimed on seeing me. "Good God! the Queen your mother is in such a rage, we would advise you for the present, to keep out of her sight —" "Yes," said I "so I would, had I been guilty of what the King has reported but I assure you all I am entirely innocent and must therefore speak with her and clear myself."

I then went into her closet which was separated from the bed-chamber by a slight partition only so that our whole conversation could be distinctly heard. She no sooner set eyes upon me than she flew into a great passion, and said everything that the fury of her resentment suggested. I related to her the whole truth and begged to refer her to the company which attended me, to the number of ten or twelve persons, desiring her not to rely on the testimony of those more immediately about me, but examine Mademoiselle Montigny, who did not belong to me, and Liancourt and Camille, who were the King's servants

She would not hear a word I had to offer, but continued to hate me in a furious manner, whether it was through fear, or affection for her son, or whether she believed the story in earnest, I know not. When I observed to her that I understood the King had done me this ill office in her opinion, her anger was redoubled, and she endeavoured to make me believe that she had been informed of the circumstance by one of her own valets de chambre, who had himself seen me at the place. Perceiving that I gave no credit to this account of the matter, she became more and more incensed against me.

All that was said was perfectly heard by those in the next room. At length I left her closet, much chagrined, and returning to my own apartments, I found the King my husband there, who said to me.

"Well was it not as I told you? He, seeing me under great concern, desired me not to grieve about it, adding "that Liancourt and Camille would attend the King that night in his bed-chamber, and relate the affair as it really was and to-morrow continued he, "the Queen your mother will receive you in a very different manner

"But, sir, replied I, "I have received too gross an affront in public to forgive those who were the occasion of it but that is nothing when compared with the malicious intention of causing so heavy a misfortune to befall me as to create a variance betwixt you and me

"But, said he, 'God be thanked, they have failed in it.

'For that, answered I, "I am the more beholden to God and your amiable disposition However continued I, "we may derive this good from it that it ought to be a warning to us to put ourselves upon our guard against the King's stratagems to bring about a disunion betwixt you and my brother by causing a rupture betwixt you and me."

Whilst I was saying this, my brother entered the apartment and I made them renew their protestations of friendship. But what oaths or promises can prevail against love ! This will appear more fully in the sequel of my story.

An Italian banker, who had concerns with my brother, came to him the next morning, and invited him, the King my husband, myself, the Princesses and other ladies, to partake of an entertainment in a garden belonging to him. Having made it a constant rule, before and after I married, as long as I remained in the Court of the Queen my mother, to go to no place without her permission, I waited on her, at her return from Mass. and asked leave to be present at this banquet. She refused to give any leave, and said she did not care where I went. I leave you to judge, who know my temper, whether I was not greatly mortified at this rebuff.

Whilst we were enjoying this entertainment, the King, having spoken with Liancourt, Camille, and Mademoiselle Montigny, was apprised of the mistake which the malice or misapprehension of Ruffé had led him into. Accordingly, he went to the Queen my mother and related the whole truth, entreating her to remove any ill impressions that might remain with me, as he perceived that I was not deficient in point of understanding and feared that I might be induced to engage in some plan of revenge.

When I returned from the banquet before mentioned, I found that what the king my husband had foretold was come to pass, for the Queen my mother sent for me into her back closet which was adjoining the king's, and told me that she was now acquainted with the truth, and found I had not deceived her with a false story. She had discovered she said, that there was not the least foundation for the report her valet de chambre had made, and should dismiss him her service as a bad man. As she perceived by my looks that I saw through this disguise, she said every thing she could think of to persuade me to a belief that the king had not mentioned it to her. She continued her arguments, and I still appeared incredulous. At length the king entered the closet and made many apologies, declaring he had been imposed on and assuring me of his most cordial friendship and esteem and thus matters were set to rights again.

LETTER IX

FRESH INTRIGUES — MARRIAGE OF HENRY III. — BUSSI
ARRIVES AT COURT AND NARROWLY ESCAPES ASSASSI-NATION

AFTER staying some time at Lyons, we went to Avignon. Le Guast, not daring to hazard any fresh imposture, and finding that my conduct afforded no ground for jealousy on the part of my husband, plainly perceived that he could not, by that means, bring about a misunderstanding betwixt my brother and the King my husband. He therefore resolved to try what he could effect through Madame de Sauve. In order to do this, he obtained such an influence over her that she acted entirely as he directed, insomuch that, by his artful instructions, the passion which these young men had conceived, hitherto wavering and cold, as is generally the case at their time of life, became of a sudden so violent that ambition and every obligation of duty were at once absorbed by their attentions to this woman.

This occasioned such a jealousy betwixt them that, though her favours were divided with M de Guise le Guast, de Souvray and others, any one of whom she preferred to the brothers-in law, yet such was the infatuation of these last that they considered each other as their only rival

To carry on le Guast's sinister designs, this woman persuaded the King my husband that I was jealous of her and on that account it was that I joined with my brother As we are ready to give ear and credit to those we love, he believed all she said From this time he became distant and reserved towards me shunning my presence as much as possible whereas before, he was open and communicative to me as to a sister, well knowing that I yielded to his pleasure in all things, and was far from harbouring jealousy of any kind

What I had dreaded, I now perceived had come to pass This was the loss of his favour and good opinion to preserve which I had studied to gain his confidence by a ready compliance with his wishes well knowing that mistrust is the sure forerunner of hatred

I now turned my mind to an endeavour to wean my brother's affection for Madame de Sauve, in order to counterplot le Guast in his design to bring about a division, and thereby to effect our ruin. I used every means with my brother to divert his passion. but the fascination was too strong, and my pains proved ineffectual. In anything else, my brother would have suffered himself to be ruled by me; but the charms of this Circe, aided by that sorcerer, le Guast, were too powerful to be dissolved by my advice. So far was he from profiting by my counsel, that he was weak enough to communicate it to her. So blind are lovers!

Her vengeance was excited by this communication, and she now entered more fully into the designs of le Guast. In consequence, she used all her art to make the King my husband conceive an aversion for me; insomuch that he scarcely ever spoke with me. He left her late at night, and, to prevent our meeting in the morning, she directed him to come to her at the Queen's levee, which she duly attended, after which he passed the rest of the day with her. My brother likewise followed her with the greatest assiduity, and she had the artifice to make each of them think that he alone had any place in her esteem. Thus was a jealousy kept up betwixt them, and, in consequence disunion and mutual ruin!

We made a considerable stay at Avignon from whence we proceeded through Burgundy and Champagne to Rheims, where the King's marriage was celebrated. From Rheims we came to Paris, things going on in their usual train, and le Guast prosecuting his designs with all the success he could wish. At Paris my brother was joined by Bussi whom he received with all the favour which his bravery merited. He was inseparable from my brother, in consequence of which I frequently saw him for my brother and I were always together, his household being equally at my devotion as if it were my own. Your aunt, remarking this harmony betwixt us has often told me that it called to her recollection the times of my uncle M<sup>d</sup> Orléans and my aunt Madame de Savoye.

Le Guast thought this a favourable circumstance to complete his design. Accordingly he suggested to Madame de Sauve to make my husband believe that it was on the account of Bussi I frequented my brother's apartments so constantly.

The King my husband being fully informed of all my proceedings from persons in his service who attended me everywhere, could not be induced to lend an ear to this story. Le Guast, finding himself foiled in this quarter, applied to the King, who was well inclined to listen to the tale, on account of his dislike to my brother and me, whose friendship for each other was displeasing to him.

Besides this, he was incensed against Bussi, who, being formerly attached to him, had now devoted himself wholly to my brother; an acquisition which, on account of the celebrity of Bussi's fame for parts and valour, redounded greatly to my brother's honour, whilst it increased the malice and envy of his enemies.

The King, thus worked upon by le Guast, mentioned it to the Queen my mother, thinking it would have the same effect on her as the tale which was trumped up at Lyons. But she, seeing through the whole design, showed him the improbability of the story, adding that he must have some wicked people about him, who could put such notions in his head, observing that I was very unfortunate to have fallen upon such evil times. "In my younger days," said she, "we were allowed to converse freely with all the gentlemen who belonged to the King our father the Dauphin, and M<sup>d</sup> d'Orléans your uncles. It was common for them to assemble in the bed-chamber of Madame Margaret, your aunt, as well as in mine, and nothing was thought of it. Neither ought it to appear strange that Bussi sees my daughter in the presence of her husband's servants. They are not shut up together. Bussi is a person of quality, and holds the first place in your brother's family. What grounds are there for such a calumny? At Lyons you caused me to offer her an affront, which I fear she will never forget.

The King was astonished to hear his mother talk in this manner, and interrupted her with saying, "Madam, I only relate what I have heard — But who is it," answered she, "that tells you all this? I fear no one that intends you any good, but rather one that wishes to create divisions amongst you all."

As soon as the King had left her she told me all that had passed, and said. "You are unfortunate to live in these times." Then calling your aunt, Madame de Dampierre, they entered into a discourse concerning the pleasures and innocent freedoms of the times they had seen, when scandal and malevolence were unknown at Court.

Le Guast, finding this plot miscarry, was not long in contriving another. He addressed himself for this purpose to certain gentlemen who attended the King my husband. These had been formerly the friends of Bussi, but, envying the glory he had obtained, were now become his enemies. Under the mask of zeal for their master, they disguised the envy which they harboured in their breasts. They entered into a design of assassinating Bussi as he left my brother to go to his own lodgings, which was generally at a late hour. They knew that he was always accompanied home by fifteen or sixteen gentlemen, belonging to my brother, and that, notwithstanding he wore no sword, having been lately wounded in the right arm, his presence was sufficient to inspire the rest with courage.

In order, therefore, to make sure work, they resolved on attacking him with two or three hundred men, thinking that night would throw a veil over the disgrace of such an assassination

Le Guast who commanded a regiment of guards furnished the requisite number of men, whom he disposed in five or six divisions, in the street through which he was to pass Their orders were to put ont the torches and flambeaux, and then to fire their pieces after which they were to charge his company observing particularly to attack one who had his right arm along in a scarf

Fortunately they escaped the intended massacre, and fighting their way through reached Bussi's lodgings one gentleman only being killed, who was particularly attached to M. de Bussi and who was probably mistaken for him as he had his arm likewise slang in a scarf

An Italian gentleman, who belonged to my brother left them at the beginning of the attack, and came running back in the Louvre. As soon as he reached my brother's chamber door he cried out aloud ' Bussi is assassinated! My brother was going out but I hearing the cry of assassination left my chamber, by good fortune not being undressed, and stopped my brother. I then sent for the Queen my mother to come with all haste in order to prevent him from going out, as he was resolved to do, regardless of what might happen. It was with difficulty we could stay him, though the Queen my mother represented the hazard he ran from the darkness of the night, and his ignorance of the nature of the attack, which might have been purposely designed by le Guast to take away his life. Her entreaties and persuasions would have been of little avail if she had not used her authority to order all the doors to be barred, and taken the resolution of remaining where she was until she had learned what had really happened.

Bussi, whom God had thus miraculously preserved, with that presence of mind which he was so remarkable for in time of battle and the most imminent danger, considering within himself when he reached home the anxiety of his master's mind should he have received any false report, and fearing he might expose himself to hazard upon the first alarm being given (which certainly would have been the case, if my mother had not interfered and prevented it), immediately despatched one of his people to let him know every circumstance

The next day Bussi showed himself at the Louvre without the least dread of enemies, as if what had happened had been merely the attack of a tournament. My brother exhibited much pleasure at the sight of Bussi, but expressed great resentment at such a daring attempt to deprive him of so brave and valuable a servant, a man whom le Guast durst not attack in any other way than by a base assassination

LETTER X

BUSSI IS SENT FROM COURT—MARGARET'S HUSBAND ATTACKED WITH A FIT OF EPILEPSY—HER GREAT CARE OF HIM—TORIGNI DISMISSED FROM MARGARET'S SERVICE—THE KING OF NAVARRE AND THE DUK OF ALLAÇON SECRETLY LEAVE THE COURT.

THE Queen my mother, a woman endowed with the greatest prudence and foresight of anyone I ever knew, apprehensive of evil consequences from this affair, and fearing a dissension betwixt her two sons, advised my brother to fall upon some pretence for sending Bussi away from Court. In this advice I joined her, and, through our united counsel and request, my brother was prevailed upon to give his consent. I had every reason to suppose that le Guast would take advantage of the rencounter to foment the coolness which already existed betwixt my brother and the King my husband into an open rupture. Bussi, who implicitly followed my brother's directions in everything, departed with a company of the bravest noblemen that were about the latter's person

Bussi was now removed from the machinations of le Guast, who likewise failed in accomplishing a design he had long projected, to disunite the king my husband and me.

One night my husband was attacked with a fit, and continued insensible for the space of an hour occasioned I supposed, by his excesses with women for I never knew anything of the kind to happen to him before. However, as it was my duty so to do, I attended him with so much care and assiduity, that when he recovered he spoke of it to everyone declaring that, if I had not perceived his indisposition and called for the help of my women he should not have survived the fit

From this time he treated me with more kindness, and the cordiality betwixt my brother and him was again revived as if I had been the point of union at which they were to meet, or the cement that joined them together

Le Guist was now at his wits end for some fresh contrivance to breed disunion in the Court

He had lately persuaded the king to remove from about the person of the Queen Consort a princess of the greatest virtue and most amiable qualities, a female attendant of the name of Changi, for whom the Queen entertained a particular esteem, as having been brought up with her. Being successful in this measure, he now thought of making the King my husband send away Torigni, whom I greatly regarded.

The argument he used with the King was, that young princesses ought to have no favourites about them.

The King, yielding to this man's persuasions, spoke of it to my husband, who observed that it would be a matter that would greatly distress me; that if I had an esteem for Torigni it was not without cause, as she had been brought up with the Queen of Spain and me from our infancy; that, moreover, Torigni was a young lady of good understanding, and had been of great use to him during his confinement at Vincennes; that it would be the greatest ingratitude in him to overlook services of such a nature, and that he remembered well when His Majesty had expressed the same sentiments.

Thus did he defend himself against the performance of so ungrateful an action. However, the King listened only to the arguments of le Guast and told my husband that he should have no more love for him if he did not remove Torigni from about me the very next morning

He was forced to comply, greatly contrary to his will, and, as he has since declared to me with much regret. Joining entreaties to commands, he laid his injunctions on me accordingly

How displeasing this separation was I plainly discovered by the many tears I shed on receiving his orders. It was in vain to represent to him the injury done to my character by the sudden removal of one who had been with me from my earliest years and was so greatly in my esteem and confidence. he could not give an ear to my reasons, being firmly bound by the promise he had made to the King

Accordingly Torigni left me that very day and went to the house of a relation M Chastelas. I was so greatly offended with this fresh indignity after so many of the kind formerly received, that I could not help yielding to resentment and my grief and concern getting the upper hand of my prudence. I exhibited a great coolness and indifference towards my husband. Le Guast and Madame de Sauve were successful in creating a like indifference on his part, which, coinciding with mine, separated us altogether, and we neither spoke to each other nor slept in the same bed.

A few days after this, some faithful servants about the person of the King my husband remarked to him the plot which had been concerted with so much artifice to lead him to his ruin, by creating a division, first betwixt him and my brother, and next betwixt him and me, thereby separating him from those in whom only he could hope for his principal support. They observed to him that already matters were brought to such a pass that the King showed little regard for him, and even appeared to despise him.

They afterwards addressed themselves to my brother, whose situation was not in the least mended since the departure of Bussi, le Guast causing fresh indignities to be offered him daily. They represented to him that the King my husband and he were both circumstanced alike, and equally in disgrace, as le Guast had everything under his direction, so that both of them were under the necessity of soliciting, through him, any favours which they might want of the King, and which, when demanded, were constantly refused them with great contempt. Moreover, it was become dangerous to offer them service, as it was inevitable ruin for anyone to do so.

'Since then, said they, "your dissensions appear to be so likely to prove fatal to both that it would be advisable in you both to unite and come to a determination of leaving the Court and after collecting together your friends and servants, to require from the King an establishment suitable to your ranks." They observed to my brother that he had never yet been put in possession of his appanage, and received for his subsistence only some certain allowances which were not regularly paid him as they passed through the hands of le Guast and were at his disposal, to be discharged or kept back, as he judged proper. They concluded with observing that with regard to the King my husband, the government of Guyenne was taken out of his hands, and neither was he permitted to visit that or any other of his dominions.

It was hereupon resolved to pursue the counsel now given, and that the king my husband and my brother should immediately withdraw themselves from Court. My brother made me acquainted with this resolution, observing to me, as my husband and he were now friends again, that I ought to forget all that had passed; that my husband had declared to him that he was sorry things had so happened, that we had been outwitted by our enemies, but that he was resolved, from henceforward, to show me every attention and give me every proof of his love and esteem, and he concluded with begging me to make my husband every show of affection, and to be watchful for their interest during their absence.

It was concerted betwixt them that my brother should depart first, making off in a carriage in the best manner he could; that, in a few days afterwards, the King my husband should follow, under pretence of going on a hunting party. They both expressed their concern that they could not take me with them, assuring me that I had no occasion to have any apprehensions, as it would soon appear that they had no design to disturb the peace of the kingdom, but merely to ensure the safety of their own persons, and to settle their establishments. In short, it might well be supposed that, in their present situation, they had reason to apprehend danger to themselves from such as had evil designs against their family.

Accordingly, as soon as it was dusk, and before the King's supper time my brother changed his cloak, and concealing the lower part of his face to his nose in it left the palace, attended by a servant who was little known, and went on foot to the gate of Saint Honoré, where he found Simier waiting for him in a coach, borrowed of a lady for the purpose.

My brother threw himself into it and went to a house about a quarter of a league out of Paris where horses were stationed ready and at the distance of about a league farther he joined a party of two or three hundred horsemen of his servants, who were awaiting his coming. My brother was not missed till nine o'clock, when the King and the Queen my mother asked me the reason he did not come to sup with them as usual and if I knew of his being indisposed

I told them I had not seen him since noon. Thereupon they sent to his apartments. Word was brought back that he was not there. Orders were then given to enquire at the apartments of the ladies whom he was accustomed to visit. He was nowhere to be found. There was now a general alarm. The King flew into a great passion, and began to threaten me. He then sent for all the Princes and the great officers of the Court, and giving orders for a pursuit to be made, and to bring him back, dead or alive, cried out. "He is gone to make war against me, but I will show him what it is to contend with a King of my power."

Many of the Princes and officers of State remonstrated against these orders, which they observed ought to be well weighed. They said that, as their duty directed, they were willing to venture their lives in the King's service; but to act against his brother they were certain would not be pleasing to the King himself, that they were well convinced his brother would undertake nothing that should give His Majesty displeasure, nor be productive of danger to the realm, that perhaps his leaving the Court was owing to some disgust which it would be more advisable to send and enquire into. Others, on the contrary, were for putting the King's orders into execution but, whatever expedition they could use, it was day before they set off, and as it was then too late to overtake my brother, they returned, being only equipped for the pursuit.

I was in tears the whole night of my brother's departure, and the next day was seized with a violent cold, which was succeeded by a fever that confined me to my bed.

Meanwhile my husband was preparing for his departure, which took up all the time he could spare from his visits to Madame de Sauve so that he did not think of me. He returned as usual at two or three in the morning, and, as we had separate beds I seldom heard him and in the morning, before I was awake he went to my mother's levee, where he met Madame de Sauve as usual.

This being the case, he quite forgot his promise to my brother of speaking to me and when he went away it was without taking leave of me.

The King did not show my husband more favour after my brother's evasion, but continued to behave with his former coolness. This the more confirmed him in the resolution of leaving the Court, so that in a few days, under the pretence of hunting, he went away.

LETTER XI

QUEEN MARGARET UNDER ARREST—ATTEMPT ON TORIGNI'S
LIFE—HER FORTUNATE DELIVERANCE

THE King supposing that I was a principal instrument in aiding the Princes in their desertion, was greatly incensed against me, and his rage became at length so violent that, had not the Queen my mother moderated it, I am inclined to think my life had been in danger. Giving way to her counsel he became more calm, but insisted upon a guard being placed over me, that I might not follow the King my husband neither have communication with anyone, so as to give the Princes intelligence of what was going on at Court. The Queen my mother gave her consent to this measure as being the least violent and was well pleased to find his anger cooled in so great a degree. She however requested that she might be permitted to discourse with me, in order to reconcile me to a submission to treatment of so different a kind from what I had hitherto known. At the same time she advised the King to consider that these troubles might not be lasting; that everything in the world bore a double aspect, that what now appeared to him horrible and alarming might, upon a second view, assume a more pleasing and tranquil look; that, as things changed, so should measures change with them; that there might come a time when he might have occasion for my services; that, as prudence counselled us not to repose too much confidence in our friends, lest they should one day become our enemies, so was it advisable to conduct ourselves in such a manner to our enemies as if we had hopes they should hereafter become our friends. By suchlike prudent remonstrances did the Queen my mother restrain the King from proceeding to extremities with me, as he would otherwise possibly have done.

Le Guast now endeavoured to divert his fury to another object, in order to wound me in a most sensitive part. He prevailed on the King to adopt a design for seizing Torigni, at the house of her cousin Chastelas, and, under pretence of bringing her before the King, to drown her in a river which they were to cross. The party sent upon this errand was admitted by Chastelas, not suspecting any evil design, without the least difficulty into his house. As soon as they had gained admission they proceeded to execute the cruel business they were sent upon, by fastening Torigni with cords and locking her up in a chamber, whilst their horses were baiting. Meantime, according to the French custom they crammed themselves, like gluttons, with the best eatables the house afforded. Chastelas who was a man of discretion, was not displeased to gain time at the expense of some part of his substance, considering that the suspension of a sentence is a prolongation of life, and that during this respite the king's heart might relent and he might countermand his former orders. With these considerations he was induced to submit though it was in his power to have called for assistance to repel this violence. But God, who hath constantly regarded my afflictions and afforded me protection against the malicious designs of my enemies was pleased to order poor Torigni to be delivered by means which I could never have devised had I been acquainted with the plot, of which I was totally ignorant. Several of the domestics, male as well as female, had left the house in a fright, fearing the insolence and rude treatment of this troop of soldiers, who behaved as riotously as if they were in a house given up to pillage. Some of these, at the distance of a quarter of a league from the house, by God's providence, fell in with Ferté and Avantignî, at the head of their troops, in number about two hundred horse, on their march to join my brother. Ferté, remarking a labourer, whom he knew to belong to Chastelas, apparently in great distress, enquired of him what was the matter, and whether he had been ill-used by any of the soldiery. The man related to him all he knew, and in what state he had left his master's house. Hereupon Ferté and Avantignî resolved, out of regard to me, to effect Torigni's deliverance, returning thanks to God for having afforded them so favourable an opportunity of testifying the respect they had always entertained towards me.

Accordingly, they proceeded to the house with all expedition, and arrived just at the moment these soldiers were setting Torigni on horseback, for the purpose of conveying her to the river wherein they had orders to plunge her Galloping into the courtyard sword in hand, they cried out "Assassins if you dare to offer that lady the least injury, you are dead men! So saying they attacked them and drove them to flight, leaving their prisoner behind, nearly as dead with joy as she was before with fear and apprehension After returning thanks to God and her deliverers for so opportune and unexpected a rescue she and her cousin Chastelas set off in a carriage, under the escort of their rescuers, and joined my brother, who since he could not have me with him was happy to have one so dear to me about him She remained under my brother's protection as long as any danger was apprehended and was treated with as much respect as if she had been with me.

Whilst the King was giving directions for this notable expedition, for the purpose of sacrificing Torigni to his vengeance the Queen my mother who had not received the least intimation of it came to my apartment as I was dressing to go abroad in order to observe how I should be received after what had passed at Court having still some alarms on account of my husband and brother. I had hitherto confined myself to my chamber, not having perfectly recovered my health, and, in reality, being all the time as much indisposed in mind as in body.

My mother, perceiving my intention, addressed me in these words: "My child, you are giving yourself unnecessary trouble in dressing to go abroad. Do not be alarmed at what I am going to tell you. Your own good sense will dictate to you that you ought not to be surprised if the King resents the conduct of your brother and husband, and, as he knows the love and friendship that exist between you three, should suppose that you were privy to their design of leaving the Court. He has, for this reason, resolved to detain you in it, as a hostage for them. He is sensible how much you are beloved by your husband, and thinks he can hold no pledge that is more dear to him. On this account it is that the King has ordered his guards to be placed, with directions not to suffer you to leave your apartments. He has done this with the advice of his counsellors, by whom it was suggested that, if you had your free liberty, you might be induced to advise your brother and husband of their deliberations I beg you will not be offended with these measures, which, if it so please God, may not be of long continuance I beg, moreover, you will not be displeased with me if I do not pay you frequent visits as I should be unwilling to create any suspicions in the King's mind However you may rest assured that I shall prevent any further steps from being taken that may prove disagreeable to you, and that I shall use my utmost endeavours to bring about a reconciliation betwixt your brothers,

I represented to her, in reply, the great indignity that was offered to me by putting me under arrest, that it was true my brother had all along communicated to me the just cause he had to be dissatisfied, but that, with respect to the King my husband, from the time Torigni was taken from me we had not spoken to each other, neither had he visited me during my indisposition nor did he even take leave of me when he left Court "This says she, "is nothing at all, it is merely a trifling difference betwixt man and wife which a few sweet words conveyed in a letter, will set to rights.

When, by such means, he has regained your affections, he has only to write to you to come to him, and you will set off at the very first opportunity. Now, this is what the King my son wishes to prevent."

LETTER XII

THE PEACE OF SENS BETWIXT HENRY III AND THE HUGUENOTS.

THE Queen my mother left me, saying these words For my part, I remained a close prisoner, without a visit from a single person, none of my most intimate friends daring to come near me, through the apprehension that such a step might prove injurious to their interests. Thus it is ever in Courts Adversity is solitary, while prosperity dwells in a crowd the object of persecution being sure to be shunned by his nearest friends and dearest connections. The brave Grillon was the only one who ventured to visit me, at the hazard of incurring disgrace. He came five or six times to see me, and my guards were so much astonished at his resolution and awed by his presence, that not a single Cerberus of them all would venture to refuse him entrance to my apartments

Meanwhile, the King my husband reached the States under his government. Being joined there by his friends and dependents, they all represented to him the indignity offered to me by his quitting the Court without taking leave of me. They observed to him that I was a princess of good understanding, and that it would be for his interest to regain my esteem; that, when matters were put on their former footing, he might derive to himself great advantage from my presence at Court. Now that he was at a distance from his Circe, Madame de Sauve, he could listen to good advice. Absence having abated the force of her charms, his eyes were opened; he discovered the plots and machinations of our enemies, and clearly perceived that a rupture could not but tend to the ruin of us both.

Accordingly, he wrote me a very affectionate letter, wherein he entreated me to forget all that had passed betwixt us, assuring me that from thenceforth he would ever love me, and would give me every demonstration that he did so, desiring me to inform him of what was going on at Court, and how it fared with me and my brother. My brother was in Champagne and the King my husband in Gascony, and there had been no communication betwixt them, though they were on terms of friendship

I received this letter during my imprisonment, and it gave me great comfort under that situation. Although my guards had strict orders not to permit me to set pen to paper, yet, as necessity is said to be the mother of invention, I found means to write many letters to him.

Some few days after I had been put under arrest my brother had intelligence of it, which chagrined him so much that had not the love of his country prevailed with him the effects of his resentment would have been shown in a cruel civil war, to which purpose he had a sufficient force entirely at his devotion. He was however withheld by his patriotism, and contented himself with writing to the Queen my mother informing her that if I was thus treated, he should be driven upon some desperate measure. She fearing the consequence of an open rupture, and dreading lest, if blows were once struck, she should be deprived of the power of bringing about a reconciliation betwixt the brothers, represented the consequences to the king, and found him well disposed to lend an ear to her reasons, as his anger was now cooled by the apprehensions of being attacked in Gascony, Dauphiny, Languedoc, and Poitou, with all the strength of the Huguenots under the King my husband.

Besides the many strong places held by the Huguenots, my brother had an army with him in Champagne, composed chiefly of nobility, the bravest and best in France. The King found, since my brother's departure, that he could not, either by threats or rewards, induce a single person among the Princes and great lords to act against him, so much did everyone fear to intermeddle in this quarrel, which they considered as of a family nature, and after having maturely reflected on his situation, he acquiesced in my mother's opinion, and begged her to fall upon some means of reconciliation. She thereupon proposed going to my brother and taking me with her. To the measure of taking me, the King had an objection, as he considered me as the hostage for my husband and brother. She then agreed to leave me behind, and set off without my knowledge of the matter. At their interview, my brother represented to the Queen my mother that he could not but be greatly dissatisfied with the King after the many mortifications he had received at Court, that the cruelty and injustice of confining me hurt him equally as if done to himself, observing moreover that, as if my arrest were not a sufficient mortification, poor Torigni must be made to suffer and concluding with the declaration of his firm resolution not to listen to any terms of peace until I was restored to my liberty, and reparation made me for the indignity I had sustained. The Queen my mother being unable to obtain any other answer returned to Court and acquainted the King with my brother's determination. Her advice was to go back again with me, for going without me, she said, would answer very little purpose and if I went with her in disgust, it would do more harm than good. Besides, there was reason to fear in that case, I should insist upon going to my husband. In short, says she, my daughter's guard must be removed and she must be satisfied in the best way we can."

The King agreed to follow her advice and was now, on a sudden, as eager to reconcile matters betwixt us as she was herself. Hereupon I was sent for, and when I came to her, she informed me that she had paved the way for peace; that it was for the good of the State, which she was sensible I must be as desirous to promote as my brother, that she had it now in her power to make a peace which would be as satisfactory as my brother could desire, and would put us entirely out of the reach of le Guast's machinations, or those of anyone else who might have an influence over the King's mind. She observed that, by assisting her to procure a good understanding betwixt the King and my brother, I should relieve her from that cruel disquietude under which she at present laboured, as, should things come to an open rupture, she could not but be grieved, whichever party prevailed, as they were both her sons. She therefore expressed her hopes that I would forget the injuries I had received, and dispose myself to concur in a peace, rather than join in any plan of revenge. She assured me that the King was sorry for what had happened, that he had even expressed his regret to her with tears in his eyes, and had declared that he was ready to give me every satisfaction I replied that I was willing to sacrifice everything for the good of my brothers and of the State that I wished for nothing so much as peace, and that I would exert myself to the utmost to bring it about.

As I uttered these words, the King came into the closet, and with a number of fine speeches, endeavoured to soften my resentment and to recover my friendship to which I made such returns as might show him I harboured no ill will for the injuries I had received. I was induced to such behaviour rather out of contempt, and because it was good policy to let the King go away satisfied with me.

Besides, I had found a secret pleasure during my confinement, from the perusal of good books, to which I had given myself up with a delight I never before experienced I consider this as an obligation I owe to Fortune, or rather, to Divine Providence, in order to prepare me, by such efficacious means to bear up against the misfortunes and calamities that awaited me. By tracing Nature in the universal book which is opened to all mankind I was led to the knowledge of the Divine

Author. Science conducts us, step by step, through the whole range of creation, until we arrive, at length, at God. Misfortune prompts us to summon our utmost strength to oppose grief and recover tranquillity, until at length we find a powerful aid in the knowledge and love of God, whilst prosperity hurries us away until we are overwhelmed by our passions. My captivity and its consequent solitude afforded me the double advantage of exciting a passion for study, and an inclination for devotion, advantages I had never experienced during the vanities and splendour of my prosperity.

As I have already observed, the King, discovering in me no signs of discontent, informed me that the Queen my mother was going into Champagne to have an interview with my brother, in order to bring about a peace, and begged me to accompany her thither and to use my best endeavours to forward his views, as he knew my brother was always well disposed to follow my counsel; and he concluded with saying that 'the peace, when accomplished, he should ever consider as being due to my good offices, and should esteem himself obliged to me for it. I promised to exert myself in so good a work which I plainly perceived was both for my brother's advantage and the benefit of the State

The Queen my mother and I set off for Sens the next day. The conference was agreed to be held in a gentleman's chateau, at a distance of about a league from that place. My brother was waiting for us accompanied by a small body of troops and the principal Catholic lords and Princes of his army. Amongst these were the Duke Casimir and Colonel Poux, who had brought him six thousand German horse, raised by the Huguenots, they having joined my brother as the King my husband and he acted in conjunction.

The treaty was continued for several days, the conditions of peace requiring much discussion, especially such articles of it as related to religion. With respect to these, when at length agreed upon, they were too much to the advantage of the Huguenots, as it appeared afterwards, to be kept but the Queen my mother gave in to them, in order to have a peace, and that the German cavalry before mentioned might be disbanded. She was, moreover, desirous to get my brother out of the hands of the Huguenots; and he was himself as willing to leave them, being always a very good Catholic, and joining the Huguenots only through necessity.

One condition of the peace was, that my brother should have a suitable establishment. My brother likewise stipulated for me, that my marriage portion should be assigned in lands, and M. de Beauvais, a commissioner on his part, insisted much upon it. My mother, however, opposed it, and persuaded me to join her in it, assuring me that I should obtain from the King all I could require. Thereupon I begged I might not be included in the articles of peace, observing that I would rather owe whatever I was to receive to the particular favour of the King and the Queen my mother, and should, besides, consider it as more secure when obtained by such means.

The peace being thus concluded and ratified on both sides, the Queen my mother prepared to return. At this instant I received letters from the King my husband, in which he expressed a great desire to see me, begging me, as soon as peace was agreed on, to ask leave to go to him

I communicated my husband's wish to the Queen my mother, and added my own entreaties. She expressed herself greatly averse from such a measure, and used every argument to set me against it. She observed that, when I refused her proposal of a divorce after Saint Bartholomew's Day she gave way to my refusal, and commended me for it, because my husband was then converted to the Catholic religion, but now, that he had abjured Catholicism, and was turned Huguenot again, she could not give her consent that I should go to him. When I still insisted upon going, she burst into a flood of tears, and said, if I did not return with her, it would prove her ruin that the King would believe it was her doing that she had promised to bring me back with her and that, when my brother returned to Court, which would be soon, she would give her consent.

We now returned to Paris, and found the King well satisfied that we had made a peace, though not however, pleased with the articles concluded in favour of the Huguenots. He therefore resolved within himself, as soon as my brother should return to Court, to find some pretext for renewing the war. These advantageous conditions were, indeed, only granted the Huguenots to get my brother out of their hands, who was detained near two months, being employed in disbanding his German horse and the rest of his army.

LETTER XIII

THE LEAGUE—WAR DECLARED AGAINST THE HUGUENOTS
—QUEEN MARGARET SETS OUT FOR SPA.

AT length my brother returned to Court, accompanied by all the Catholic nobility who had followed his fortunes. The King received him very graciously and showed by his reception of him, how much he was pleased at his return. Bussi, who returned with my brother, met likewise with a gracious reception. Le Guast was now no more, having died under the operation of a particular regimen ordered for him by his physician. He had given himself up to every kind of debauchery and his death seemed the judgment of the Almighty on one whose body had long been perishing, and whose soul had been made over to the prince of demons as the price of assistance through the means of diabolical magic, which he constantly practised. The King, though now without this instrument of his malicious contrivances turned his thoughts entirely upon the destruction of the Huguenots. To effect this, he strove to engage my brother against them, and thereby make them his enemies, and that I might be considered as another enemy, he used every means to prevent me from going to the King my husband. Accordingly he showed every mark of attention to both of us, and manifested an inclination to gratify all our wishes.

After some time, M. de Duras arrived at Court, sent by the King my husband to hasten my departure. Hereupon, I pressed the King greatly to think well of it, and give me his leave. He, to colour his refusal, told me he could not part with me at present, as I was the chief ornament of his Court; that he must keep me a little longer, after which he would accompany me himself on my way as far as Poitiers. With this answer and assurance, he sent M. de Duras back. These excuses were purposely framed in order to gain time, until everything was prepared for declaring war against the Huguenots, and, in consequence, against the King my husband, as he fully designed to do.

As a pretence to break with the Huguenots, a report was spread abroad that the Catholics were dissatisfied with the Peace of Sens and thought the terms of it too advantageous for the Huguenots. This rumour succeeded, and produced all that discontent amongst the Catholics intended by it. A league was formed in the provinces and great cities which was joined by numbers of the Catholics. M. de Guise was named as the head of all. This was well known to the King who pretended to be ignorant of what was going forward though nothing else was talked of at Court.

The States were convened to meet at Blois. Previous to the opening of this assembly the King called my brother to his closet, where were present the Queen my mother and some of the King's counsellors. He represented the great consequence the Catholic league was to his State and authority, even though they should appoint de Guise as the head of it. That such a measure was of the highest importance to them both, meaning my brother and himself. That the Catholics had very just reason to be dissatisfied with the peace, and that it behoved him, addressing himself to my brother, rather to join the Catholics than the Huguenots, and this from conscience as well as interest. He concluded his address to my brother with conjuring him, as a son of France and a good Catholic, to assist him with his aid and counsel in this critical juncture, when his crown and the Catholic religion were both at stake. He further said that, in order to get the start of so formidable a league, he ought to form one himself, and become the head of it, as well to show his zeal for religion as to prevent the Catholics from uniting under any other leader. He then proposed to declare himself the head of a league, which should be joined by my brother, the Princes, lords, governors, and others holding offices under the Government. Thus was my brother reduced to the necessity of making His Majesty a tender of his services for the support and maintenance of the Catholic religion

The King, having now obtained assurances of my brother's assistance in the event of a war, which was his sole view in the league which he had formed with so much art, assembled together

the Princes and great lords of his Court, and, calling for the roll of the league, signed it first himself, next calling upon my brother to sign it, and lastly, upon all present.

The next day the States opened their meeting when the King, calling upon the Bishops of Lyons, Ambrune Vienne, and other prelates there present, for their advice, was told that, after the oath taken at his coronation no oath made to heretics could bind him, and therefore he was absolved from his engagements with the Huguenots.

This declaration being made at the opening of the assembly, and war declared against the Huguenots, the King abruptly dismissed from Court the Huguenot, Genisac, who had arrived a few days before charged by the King my husband with a commission to hasten my departure. The King very sharply told him that his sister had been given to a Catholic, and not to a Huguenot and that if the King my husband expected to have me, he must declare himself a Catholic.

Every preparation for war was made, and nothing else talked of at Court and to make my brother still more obnoxious to the Huguenots, he had the command of an army given him. Genisac came and informed me of the rough message he had been dismissed with. Hereupon I went directly to the closet of the Queen my mother, where I found the King. I expressed my resentment at being deceived by him, and at being cajoled by his promise to accompany me from Paris to Poitiers, which, as it now appeared, was a mere pretence. I represented that I did not marry by my own choice, but entirely agreeable to the advice of King Charles, the Queen my mother, and himself; that, since they had given him to me for a husband, they ought not to hinder me from partaking of his fortunes; that I was resolved to go to him, and that if I had not their leave, I would get away how I could, even at the hazard of my life. The King answered: "Sister, it is not now a time to importune me for leave. I acknowledge that I have, as you say, hitherto prevented you from going, in order to forbid it altogether. From the time the King of Navarre changed his religion, and again become a Huguenot, I have been against your going to him. What the Queen my mother and I are doing is for your good. I am determined to carry on a war of extermination until this wretched religion of the Huguenots, which is of so mischievous a nature, is no more. Consider, my sister if you, who are a Catholic were once in their hands you would become a hostage for me, and prevent my design. And who knows but they might seek their revenge upon me by taking away your life? No you shall not go amongst them and if you leave us in the manner you have now mentioned, rely upon it that you will make the Queen your mother and me your bitterest enemies and that we shall use every means to make you feel the effects of our resentment, and, moreover, you will make your husband's situation worse instead of better.

I went from this audience with much dissatisfaction, and taking advice of the principal persons of both sexes belonging to Court whom I esteemed my friends I found them all of opinion that it would be exceedingly improper for me to remain in a Court now at open variance with the King my husband. They recommended me not to stay at Court whilst the war lasted, saying it would be more honourable for me to leave the kingdom under the pretence of a pilgrimage, or a visit to some of my kindred. The Princess of Roche-sur-Yon was amongst those I consulted upon the occasion, who was on the point of setting off for Spa to take the waters there.

My brother was likewise present at the consultation, and brought with him Mondoucet, who had been to Flanders in quality of the King's agent, from whence he was just returned to represent to the King the discontent that had arisen amongst the Flemings on account of infringements made by the Spanish Government on the French laws. He stated that he was commissioned by several nobles, and the municipalities of several towns, to declare how much they were inclined in their hearts towards France, and how ready they were to come under a French government. Mondoucet, perceiving the King not inclined to listen to his representation, as having his mind wholly occupied by the war he had entered into with the Huguenots, whom he was resolved to punish for having joined my brother, had ceased to move in it further to the King, and addressed himself on the subject to my brother. My brother, with that princely spirit which led him to undertake great achievements, readily lent an ear to Mondoucet's proposition, and promised to engage in it, for he was born rather to conquer than to keep what he conquered. Mondoucet's proposition was the more pleasing to him as it was not unjust, it being in fact, to recover to France what had been usurped by Spain.

Mondoucet had now engaged himself in my brother's service, and was to return to Flanders under a pretence of accompanying the Princess of Roche-sur Yon in her journey to Spa and as this agent perceived my counsellors to be at a loss for some pretence for my leaving Court and quitting France during the war and that at first Savoy was proposed for my retreat, then Lorraine, and then Our Lady of Loretto, he suggested to my brother that I might be of great use to him in Flanders if under the colour of any complaint, I should be recommended to drink the Spa waters, and go with the Princess of Roche-sur Yon. My brother acquiesced in this opinion, and came up to me saying 'Oh, Queen! you need be no longer at a loss for a place to go to. I have observed that you have frequently an erysipelas on your arm, and you must accompany the Princess to Spa. You must say your physicians had ordered those waters for the complaint; but when they did so, it was not the season to take them. That season is now approaching, and you hope to have the King's leave to go there."

My brother did not deliver all he wished to say at that time, because the Cardinal de Bourbon was present, whom he knew to be a friend to the Guises and to Spain. However, I saw through his real design, and that he wished me to promote his views in Flanders.

The company approved of my brother's advice, and the Princess of Roche-sur-Yon heard the proposal with great joy, having a great regard for me. She promised to attend me to the Queen my mother when I should ask her consent.

The next day I found the Queen alone, and represented to her the extreme regret I experienced in finding that a war was inevitable betwixt the King my husband and His Majesty, and that I must continue in a state of separation from my husband, that, as long as the war lasted, it was neither decent nor honourable for me to stay at Court, where I must be in one or other, or both, of these cruel situations either that the King my husband should believe that I continued in it out of inclination and think me deficient in the duty I owed him, or that His Majesty should entertain suspicions of my giving intelligence to the King my husband. Either of these cases, I observed could not but prove injurious to me. I therefore prayed her not to take it amiss if I desired to remove myself from Court and from becoming so unpleasantly situated adding that my physicians had for some time recommended me to take the Spa waters for an erysipelas—to which I had been long subject—on my arm the season for taking these waters was now approaching and that if she approved of it, I would use the present opportunity, by which means I should be at a distance from Court and show my husband that as I could not be with him I was unwilling to remain amongst his enemies. I further expressed my hopes that through her prudence, a peace might be effected in a short time betwixt the King my husband and His Majesty and that my husband might be restored to the favour he formerly enjoyed; that whenever I learned the news of so joyful an event, I would renew my solicitations to be permitted to go to my husband. In the meantime I should hope for her permission to have the honour of accompanying the Princess of Rochesur-Yon, there present, in her journey to Spa.

She approved of what I proposed, and expressed her satisfaction that I had taken so prudent a resolution. She observed how much she was chagrined when she found that the King, through the evil persuasions of the bishops, had resolved to break through the conditions of the last peace, which she had concluded in his name. She saw already the ill effects of this hasty proceeding, as it had removed from the King's council many of his ablest and best servants. This gave her, she said, much concern, as it did likewise to think I could not remain at Court without offending my husband, or creating jealousy and suspicion in the King's mind. This being certainly what was likely to be the consequence of my staying, she would advise the King to give me leave to set out on this journey.

She was as good as her word, and the King discoursed with me on the subject without exhibiting the smallest resentment. Indeed he was well pleased now that he had prevented me from going to the King my husband, for whom he had conceived the greatest animosity.

He ordered a courier to be immediately despatched to Don John of Austria—who commanded for the King of Spain in Flanders—to obtain from him the necessary passports for a free passage in the countries under his command, as I should be obliged to cross a part of Flanders to reach Spa, which is in the bishopric of Liège.

All matters being thus arranged, we separated in a few days after this interview. The short time my brother and I remained together was employed by him in giving me instructions for the commission I had undertaken to execute for him in Flanders. The King and the Queen my mother set out for Poitiers, to be near the army of M. de Mayenne then besieging Brouage which place being reduced it was intended to march into Gascony and attack the King my husband.

My brother had the command of another army, ordered to besiege Issoire and some other towns, which he soon after took.

For my part, I set out on my journey to Flanders accompanied by the Princess of Rochesur-Yon, Madame de Tournon, the lady of my bed-chamber, Madame de Mouy of Picardy, Madame de Chastelaine, De Millon, Mademoiselle d'Atric, Mademoiselle de Tournon, and seven or eight other young ladies. My male attendants were the Cardinal de Lenoncourt, the Bishop of Langres, and M. de Mouy, Lord of Picardy, at present father-in-law to the brother of Queen Louisa, called the Count of Chalingy, with my principal steward of the household, my chief esquires, and the other gentlemen of my establishment

LETTER XIV

DESCRIPTION OF QUEEN MARGARET'S EQUIPAGE—HER JOURNEY TO LIÈGE DESCRIBED—SHE ENTERS WITH SUCCESS UPON HER MISSION—STRIKING INSTANCE OF MATERNAL DUTY AND AFFECTION IN A GREAT LADY—DISASTERS NEAR THE CLOSE OF THE JOURNEY

THE cavalcade that attended me excited great curiosity as it passed through the several towns in the course of my journey, and reflected no small degree of credit on France, as it was splendidly set out and made a handsome appearance. I travelled in a litter, raised with pillars. The lining of it was Spanish velvet of a crimson colour embroidered in various devices with gold and different coloured silk thread. The windows were of glass painted in devices. The lining and windows had in the whole forty devices all different and alluding to the sun and its effects. Each device had its motto either in the Spanish or Italian language. My litter was followed by two others, in the one was the Prince of Rochesur-Yvon, and in the other Madame de Tournon, my lady of the bed-chamber. After them followed ten maid-of-honour, each abreast with their governess, and last of all, six coaches and chariot with the rest of the ladies and all our female attendants.

I took the road of Picardy, the towns in which I arrived had received the king's orders to prepare a magnificent entertainment. I first arrived at Le Cateau, a very pleasant but rather barren district from the frontier of the Cambrésis, the Bishop of Cambray received me there, acknowledging the king of Spain only as his overlord, sent gentlemen to enquire of me at what hour I should leave the place, as he intended to meet me on the borders of his territory.

Accordingly I found him there, attended by a number of his people who appeared to be true Flemings and to have all the rusticity, and unpolished manners of their countrymen. The bishop was of the House of Barlemon, one of the principal families in Flanders. All of this house have shown themselves Spaniards at heart, and at that time were firmly attached to Don

John The bishop received me with great politeness and not a little of the Spanish ceremony

Although the city of Cambray is not so well built as some of our towns in France, I thought it, notwithstanding, far more pleasant than many of these as the streets and squares are larger and better disposed The churches are grand and highly ornamented, which is, indeed, common to France, but what I admired, above all, was the citadel, which is the finest and best constructed in Christendom The Spaniards experienced it to be strong whilst my brother had it in his possession The governor of the citadel at this time was a worthy gentleman named M d Ainsî who was, in every respect a polite and well accomplished man, having the carriage and behaviour of one of our most perfect courtiers, very different from the rude incivility which appears to be the characteristic of a Fleming

The bishop gave us a grand supper, and after supper a ball, to which he had invited all the ladies of the city As soon as the ball was opened he withdrew in accordance with the Spanish ceremony but M d Ainsî did the honours for him, and kept me company during the ball, conducting me afterwards to a collation, which, considering his command at the citadel, was, I thought, imprudent. I speak from experience, having been taught, to my cost, and contrary to my desire, the caution and vigilance necessary to be observed in keeping such places. As my regard for my brother was always predominant with me, I continually had his instructions in mind, and now thought I had a fair opportunity to open my commission and forward his views in Flanders, this town of Cambray, and especially the citadel, being, as it were, a key to that country. Accordingly I employed all the talents God had given me to make M. d'Ainsi a friend to France, and attach him to my brother's interest. Through God's assistance I succeeded with him, and so much was M. d'Ainsi pleased with my conversation that he came to the resolution of soliciting the bishop his master to grant him leave to accompany me as far as Namur, where Don John of Austria was in waiting to receive me, observing that he had a great desire to witness so splendid an interview. This Spanish Fleming, the bishop, had the weakness to grant M<sup>d</sup> Ainsis request, who continued following in my train for ten or twelve days. During this time he took every opportunity of discoursing with me, and showed that in his heart he was well disposed to embrace the service of France wishing no better master than the Prince my brother and declaring that he heartily despised being under the command of his bishop who, though his sovereign was not his superior by birth, being born a private gentleman like himself, and, in every other respect greatly his inferior.

Leaving Cambray, I set out to sleep at Valenciennes the chief city of a part of Flanders called by the same name. Where this country is divided from the Cambresis (as far as which I was conducted by the Bishop of Cambray) the Count de Lalain M<sup>d</sup> de Montigny his brother, and a number of gentlemen, to the amount of two or three hundred, came to meet me.

Valenciennes is a town inferior to Cambray in point of strength but equal to it for the beauty of its squares and churches the former ornamented with fountains as the latter are with curious clocks. The ingenuity of the Germans in the construction of their clocks was a matter of great surprise to all my attendants, few amongst whom had ever before seen clocks exhibiting a number of moving figures, and playing a variety of tunes in the most agreeable manner.

The Count de Lalam, the governor of the city, invited the lords and gentlemen of my train to a banquet, reserving himself to give an entertainment to the ladies on our arrival at Mons, where we should find the Countess his wife, his sister-in-law Madame d'Aurec, and other ladies of distinction. Accordingly the Count, with his attendants, conducted us thither the next day. He claimed a relationship with the King my husband, and was, in reality, a person who carried great weight and authority. He was much dissatisfied with the Spanish Government, and had conceived a great dislike for it since the execution of Count Egmont, who was his near kinsman.

Although he had hitherto abstained from entering into the league with the Prince of Orange and the Huguenots, being himself a steady Catholic, yet he had not admitted of an interview with Don John, neither would he suffer him, nor anyone in the interest of Spain, to enter upon his territories Don John was unwilling to give the Count any umbrage, lest he should force him to unite the Catholic League of Flanders, called the League of the States, to that of the Prince of Orange and the Huguenots well foreseeing that such a union would prove fatal to the Spanish interest, as other governors have since experienced. With this disposition of mind, the Count de Lalain thought he could not give me sufficient demonstrations of the joy he felt by my presence and he could not have shown more honour to his natural prince nor displayed greater marks of zeal and affection

On our arrival at Mons I was lodged in his house, and found there the Countess his wife and a Court consisting of eighty or a hundred ladies of the city and country My reception was rather that of their sovereign lady than of a foreign princess The Flemish ladies are naturally lively affable and engaging The Countess de Lalain is remarkably so and is moreover, a woman of great sense and elevation of mind, in which particular, as well as in air and countenance she carries a striking resemblance to the lady your cousin We became immediately intimate, and commenced a firm friendship at our first meeting. When the supper hour came, we sat down to a banquet, which was succeeded by a ball; and thence the Count observed as long as I stayed at Mons, which was, indeed, longer than I intended. It had been my intention to stay at Mons one night only, but the Count's obliging lady prevailed on me to pass a whole week there. I strove to excuse myself from so long a stay, imagining it might be inconvenient to them; but whatever I could say availed nothing with the Count and his lady, and I was under the necessity of remaining with them eight days. The Countess and I were on so familiar a footing that she staid in my bed-chamber till a late hour, and would not have left me then had she not imposed upon herself a task very rarely performed by persons of her rank, which, however, placed the goodness of her disposition in the most amiable light. In fact, she gave suck to her infant son, and one day at table, sitting next me, whose whole attention was absorbed in the promotion of my brother's interest—the table being the place where, according to the custom of the country, all are familiar and ceremony is laid aside—she, dressed out in the richest manner and blazing with diamonds gave the breast to her child without rising from her seat the infant being brought to the table as superbly habited as its nurse the mother. She performed this maternal duty with so much good humour and with a gracefulness peculiar to herself that this charitable office—which would have appeared disgusting and been considered as an affront if done by some others of equal rank—gave pleasure to all who sat at table, and accordingly, they signified their approbation by their applause.

The tables being removed, the dances commenced in the same room wherein we had supped which was magnificent and large. The Countess and I sitting side by side, I expressed the pleasure I received from her conversation, and that I should place this meeting amongst the happiest events of my life. “Indeed, said I “I shall have cause to regret that it ever did take place, as I shall depart from hence so unwillingly, there being so little probability of our meeting again soon. Why did Heaven deny our being born in the same country !

This was said in order to introduce my brother &

business. She replied, "This country did, indeed, formerly belong to France, and our lawyers now plead their causes in the French language. The greater part of the people here still retain an affection for the French nation. For my part," added the Countess, "I have had a strong attachment to your country ever since I have had the honour of seeing you. This country has been long in the possession of the House of Austria, but the regard of the people for that house has been greatly weakened by the death of Count Egmont, M. de Horne, M. de Montigny and others of the same party, some of them our near relations, and all of the best families of the country. We entertain the utmost dislike for the Spanish Government, and wish for nothing so much as to throw off the yoke of their tyranny; but, as the country is divided betwixt different religions, we are at a loss how to effect it. If we could unite, we should soon drive out the Spaniards, but this division amongst ourselves renders us weak. Would to God, the King your brother would come to a resolution of reconquering this country, to which he has an ancient claim! We should all receive him with open arms."

This was a frank declaration, made by the Countess without premeditation, but it had been long agitated in the minds of the people who considered that it was from France they were to hope for redress from the evils with which they were afflicted. I now found I had as favourable an opening as I could wish for to declare my errand. I told her that the King of France my brother was averse from engaging in foreign war and the more so as the Huguenots in his kingdom were too strong to admit of his sending any large force out of it.

My brother Alençon, said I 'has sufficient means, and might be induced to undertake it. He has equal valour prudence and benevolence with the King my brother or any of his ancestors. He has been bred to arms, and is esteemed one of the bravest generals of these times. He has the command of the King's army against the Huguenots, and has lately taken a well fortified town, called Issouire, and some other places that were in their possession. You could not invite to your assistance a prince who has it so much in his power to give it being not only a neighbour but having a kingdom like France at his devotion, from whence he may expect to derive the necessary aid and succour. The Count your husband may be assured that if he do my brother this good office he will not find him ungrateful, but may set what price he pleases upon his meritorious service. My brother is of a noble and generous disposition, and ready to requite those who do him favours. He is, moreover, an admirer of men of honour and gallantry, and accordingly is followed by the bravest and best men France has to boast of. I am in hopes that a peace will soon be re-established with the Huguenots, and expect to find it so on my return to France. If the Count your husband thinks as you do, and will permit me to speak to him on the subject, I will engage to bring my brother over to the proposal, and, in that case, your country in general, and your house in particular, will be well satisfied with him. If, through your means, my brother should establish himself here, you may depend on seeing me often, there being no brother or sister who has a stronger affection for each other."

The Countess appeared to listen to what I said with great pleasure, and acknowledged that she had entered upon this discourse without design. She observed that, having perceived I did her the honour to have some regard for her she had resolved within herself not to let me depart out of the country without explaining to me the situation of it and begging me to procure the aid of France to relieve them from the apprehensions of living in a state of perpetual war or of submitting to Spanish tyranny. She thereupon entreated me to allow her to relate our present conversation to her husband and permit them both to confer with me on the subject the next day. To this I readily gave my consent.

Thus we passed the evening in discourse upon the object of my mission and I observed that she took a singular pleasure in talking upon it in all our succeeding conferences when I thought proper to introduce it. The ball being ended we went to hear vespers at the church of the Canonesses<sup>1</sup> an order of nuns, of which we have none in France. These are young ladies who are entered in these communities at a tender age, in order to improve their fortunes till they are of an age to be married. They do not all sleep under the same roof, but in detached houses within an enclosure. In each of these houses are three, four, or perhaps six young girls under the care of an old woman. These governesses, together with the abbess, are of the number of such as have never been married. These girls never wear the habit of the order but in church, and the service there ended, they dress like others, pay visits, frequent balls, and go where they please. They were constant visitors at the Count's entertainments, and danced at his balls.

---

<sup>1</sup> See geographical note to Memoirs, p. 273.

The Countess thought the time long until the night when she had an opportunity of relating to the Count the conversation she had with me, and the opening of the business. The next morning she came to me, and brought her husband with her. He entered into a detail of the grievances the country laboured under, and the just reasons he had for ridding it of the tyranny of Spain. In doing this, he said he should not consider himself as acting against his natural Sovereign, because he well knew he ought to look for him in the person of the King of France. He explained to me the means whereby my brother might establish himself in Flanders, having possession of Hainault, which extended as far as Brussels. He said the difficulty lay in securing the Cambresis, which is situated betwixt Hainault and Flanders. It would, therefore be necessary to engage M<sup>r</sup> d'Ainsi in the business. To this I replied that, as he was his neighbour and friend, it might be better that he should open the matter to him, and I begged he would do so. I next assured him that he might have the most perfect reliance on the gratitude and friendship of my brother, and be certain of receiving as large a share of power and authority as such a service done by a person of his rank merited. Lastly, we agreed upon an interview betwixt my brother and M<sup>r</sup> de Montigny the brother of the Count, which was to take place at La Fère, upon my return, when this business should be arranged. During the time I stayed at Mons, I said all I could to confirm the Count in this resolution in which I found myself seconded by the Countess.

The day of my departure was now arrived, to the great regret of the ladies of Mons, as well as myself. The Countess expressed herself in terms which showed she had conceived the warmest friendship for me, and made me promise to return by way of that city. I presented the Countess with a diamond bracelet, and to the Count I gave a riband and diamond star of considerable value. But these presents, valuable as they were, became more so, in their estimation, as I was the donor.

Of the ladies, none accompanied me from this place, except Madame d'Aurec. She went with me to Namur, where I slept that night, and where she expected to find her husband and the Duke d'Arscot, her brother-in-law, who had been there since the 'peace betwixt the King of Spain and the States of Flanders. For though they were both of the party of the States, yet the Duke d'Arscot, being an old courtier and having attended King Philip in Flanders and England, could not withdraw himself from Court and the society of the great. The Count de Lalain, with all his nobles, conducted me two leagues beyond his government, and until he saw Don John's company in the distance advancing to meet me. He then took his leave of me, being unwilling to meet Don John, but M d'Ainsi stayed with me, as his master the Bishop of Cambray, was in the Spanish interest.

This gallant company having left me, I was soon after met by Don John of Austria, preceded by a great number of running footmen, and escorted only by twenty or thirty horsemen. He was attended by a number of lords, and amongst the rest the Duke d'Arscot, M d'Aurec, the Marquis de Varenbon and the younger Balençon, governor, for the King of Spain of the county of Burgundy. These two last who are brothers, had ridden post to meet me. Of Don John's household there was only Louis de Gonzago of any rank. He called himself a relation of the Duke of Mantua, the others were mean looking people, and of no consideration. Don John alighted from his horse to salute me in my litter which was opened for the purpose. I returned the salute after the French fashion to him, the Duke d'Arscot and M d'Aurec. After an exchange of compliments, he mounted his horse, but continued in discourse with me until we reached the city, which was not before it grew dark, as I set off late the ladies of Mons keeping me as long as they could amusing them selves with viewing my litter, and requiring an explanation of the different mottoes and devices. However, as the Spaniards excel in preserving good order, Namur appeared with particular advantage, for the streets were well lighted, every house being illuminated, so that the blaze exceeded that of daylight.

Our supper was served to us in our respective apartments, Don John being unwilling, after the fatigue of so long a journey, to incommode us with a banquet. The house in which I was lodged had been newly furnished for the purpose of receiving me. It consisted of a magnificent large saloon, with a private apartment, consisting of lodging rooms and closets, furnished in the most costly manner, with furniture of every kind, and hung with the richest tapestry of velvet and satin, divided into compartments by columns of silver embroidery, with knobs of gold, all wrought in the most superb manner. Within these compartments were figures in antique habits, embroidered in gold and silver.

The Cardinal de Lenoncourt, a man of taste and curiosity, being one day in these apartments with the Duke d Arscot, who, as I have before observed, was an ornament to Don John's Court, remarked to him that this furniture seemed more proper for a great king than a young unmarried prince like Don John. To which the Duke d Arscot replied that it came to him as a present, having been sent to him by a bashaw belonging to the Grand Signior whose sons he had made prisoners in a signal victory obtained over the Turks. Don John having sent the bashaw's sons back without ransom the father in return, made him a present of a large quantity of gold, silver and silk stuffs, which he caused to be wrought into tapestry at Milan, where there are curious workmen in this way, and he had the Queen's bed-chamber hung with tapestry representing the battle in which he had so gloriously defeated the Turks.

The next morning Don John conducted us to chapel, where we heard Mass celebrated after the Spanish manner with all kinds of music, after which we partook of a banquet prepared by Don John. He and I were seated at a separate table, at a distance of three yards from which stood the great one, of which the honours were done by Madame d'Aurec. At this table the ladies and principal lords took their seats. Don John was served with drink by Louis de Gonzago, kneeling. The tables being removed, the ball was opened, and the dancing continued the whole afternoon. The evening was spent in conversation between Don John and me, who told me I greatly resembled the Queen his mistress, by whom he meant the late Queen my sister, and for whom he professed to have entertained a very high esteem. In short, Don John manifested, by every mark of attention and politeness, as well to me as to my attendants, the very great pleasure he had in receiving me.

The boats which were to convey me upon the Meuse to Liège not all being ready, I was under the necessity of staying another day. The morning was passed as that of the day before. After dinner, we embarked on the river in a very beautiful boat, surrounded by others having on board musicians playing on hautboys, horns and violins, and landed at an island where Don John had caused a collation to be prepared in a large bower formed with branches of ivy, in which the musicians were placed in small recesses, playing on their instruments during the time of supper The tables being removed, the dances began, and lasted till it was time to return, which I did in the same boat that conveyed me thither, and which was that provided for my voyage.

The next morning Don John conducted me to the boat, and there took a most polite and courteous leave, charging M and Madame d Aurec to see me safe to Hny, the first town belonging to the Bishop of Liège where I was to sleep As soon as Don John had gone on shore, M d Ains who remained in the boat and who had the bishop of Cambray's permission to go to Namur only, took leave of me with many protestations of fidelity and attachment to my brother and myself

But Fortune envious of my hitherto prosperous journey, gave me two omens of the sinister events of my return

The first was the sudden illness which attacked Mademoiselle de Tournon, the daughter of the lady of my bed-chamber, a young person, accomplished, with every grace and virtue and for whom I had the most perfect regard No sooner had the boat left the shore than this young lady was seized with an alarming disorder, which, from the great pain attending it, caused her to scream in the most doleful manner. The physicians attributed the cause to spasms of the heart, which, notwithstanding the utmost exertions of their skill, carried her off a few days after my arrival at Liège. As the history of this young lady is remarkable, I shall relate it in my next letter.

The other omen was what happened to us at Huy, immediately upon our arrival there. This town is built on the declivity of a mountain, at the foot of which runs the river Meuse. As we were about to land, there fell a torrent of rain, which, coming down the steep sides of the mountain, swelled the river instantly to such a degree that we had only time to leap out of the boat and run to the top, the flood reaching the very highest street, next to where I was to lodge. There we were forced to put up with such accommodation as could be procured in the house, as it was impossible to remove the smallest article of our baggage from the boats, or even to stir out of the house we were in, the whole city being under water. However, the town was as suddenly relieved from this calamity as it had been afflicted with it for, on the next morning, the whole inundation had ceased the waters having run off, and the river being confined within its usual channel

Leaving Huy, M and Madame d'Aurec returned to Don John at Namur, and I proceeded, in the boat, to sleep that night at Liège

LETTER XV

THE CITY OF LIÈGE DESCRIBED—AFFECTING STORY OF MADEMOISELLE DE TOURNON—FATAL EFFECTS OF SUP-PRESSED ANGUISH OF MIND

THE Bishop of Liège, who is the Sovereign of the city and province, received me with all the cordiality and respect that could be expected from a personage of his dignity and great accomplishments. He was, indeed, a nobleman endowed with singular prudence and virtue, agreeable in his person and conversation, gracious and magnificent in his carriage and behaviour, to which I may add that he spoke the French language perfectly.

He was constantly attended by his chapter, with several of his canons, who are all sons of dukes, counts, or great German lords. The bishopric is itself a sovereign State, which brings in a considerable revenue, and includes a number of fine cities. The bishop is chosen from amongst the canons, who must be of noble descent, and resident one year. The city is larger than Lyons, and much resembles it, having the Meuse running through it. The houses in which the canons reside have the appearance of noble palaces. The streets of the city are regular and spacious, the houses of the citizens well built, the squares large and ornamented with curious fountains. The churches appear as if raised entirely of marble, of which there are considerable quarries in the neighbourhood. They are all of them ornamented with beautiful clocks, and exhibit a variety of moving figures.

The bishop received me as I landed from the boat, and conducted me to his magnificent residence ornamented with delicious fountains and gardens set off with galleries, all painted, superbly gilt, and enriched with marble, beyond description.

The spring which affords the waters of Spa<sup>1</sup> being distant no more than three or four leagues from the city of Liège, and there being only a village consisting of three or four small houses on the spot, the Princess of Roche-sur-Yon was advised by her physicians to stay at Liège and have the waters brought to her, which they assumed her would have equal efficacy, if taken after sunset and before sunrise, as if drunk at the spring. I was well pleased that she resolved to follow the advice of the doctors, as we were more comfortably lodged and had an agreeable society, for, besides his Grace (so the bishop is styled, as a king is addressed his Majesty, and a prince his Highness), the news of my arrival being spread about, many lords and ladies came from Germany to visit me. Amongst these was the Countess d'Arenberg, who had the honour to accompany Queen Elizabeth to Mezieres, to which place she came to marry King Charles my brother, a lady very high in the estimation of the Empress, the Emperor, and all the Princes in Christendom. With her came her sister the Landgravine, Madame d'Arenberg her daughter, M. d'Arenberg her son, a gallant and accomplished nobleman, the perfect image of his father, who brought the Spanish succours to King Charles my brother, and returned with great honour and additional reputation. This meeting, so honourable to me, and so much to my satisfaction, was damped by the grief and concern occasioned by the loss of Mademoiselle de Tournon whose story, being of a singular nature, I shall now relate to you agreeably to the promise I made in my last letter

---

<sup>1</sup> See Spa in Geographical Notes, p. 282

I must begin with observing to you that Madame de Tournon, at this time lady of my bed-chamber, had several daughters the eldest of whom married M de Balençon governor, for the king of Spain in the county of Burgundy This daughter, upon her marriage, had solicited her mother to admit of her taking her sister, the young lady whose story I am now about to relate to live with her as she was going to a country strange to her, and wherein she had no relations. To this her mother consented and the young lady being universally admired for her modesty and graceful accomplishments for which she certainly deserved admiration, attracted the notice of the Marquis de Varenbon The Marquis, as I before mentioned is the brother of M de Balençon, and was intended for the Church but being violently enamoured of Mademoiselle de Tournon (whom as he lived in the same house he had frequent opportunities of seeing) he now begged his brother's permission to marry her, not having yet taken orders. The young lady's family, to whom he had likewise communicated his wish, readily gave their consent, but his brother refused his, strongly advising him to change his resolution and put on the gown.

Thus were matters situated when her mother, Madame de Tournon, a virtuous and pious lady, thinking she had cause to be offended, ordered her daughter to leave the house of her sister, Madame de Balençon, and come to her. The mother, a woman of a violent spirit, not considering that her daughter was grown up and merited a mild treatment, was continually scolding the poor young lady, so that she was for ever with tears in her eyes. Still, there was nothing to blame in the young girl's conduct, but such was the severity of the mother's disposition. The daughter, as you may well suppose, wished to be from under the mother's tyrannical government, and was accordingly delighted with the thoughts of attending me in this journey to Flanders, hoping, as it happened, that she should meet the Marquis de Varenbon somewhere on the road, and that, as he had now abandoned all thoughts of the Church, he would renew his proposal of marriage, and take her from her mother

I have before mentioned that the Marquis de Varenbon and the younger Balençon joined us at Namur. Young Balençon who was far from being so agreeable as his brother, addressed himself to the young lady, but the Marquis during the whole time we stayed at Namur, paid not the least attention to her, and seemed as if he had never been acquainted with her.

The resentment, grief and disappointment occasioned by a behaviour so slighting and unnatural was necessarily stifled in her breast as decorum and her sex's pride obliged her to appear as if she disregarded it. but when, after taking leave all of them left the boat, the anguish of her mind, which she had hitherto suppressed could no longer be restrained and labouring for vent it stopped her respiration and forced from her those lamentable outcries which I have already spoken of. Her youth combated for eight days with this uncommon disorder, but at the expiration of that time she died to the great grief of her mothér, as well as myself. I say of her mother, for, though she was so rigidly severe over this daughter, she tenderly loved her.

The funeral of this unfortunate young lady was solemnised with all proper ceremonies, and conducted in the most honourable manner, as she was descended from a great family, allied to the Queen my mother. When the day of interment arrived, four of my gentlemen were appointed bearers, one of whom was named la Boessière. This man had entertained a secret passion for her, which he never durst declare on account of the inferiority of his family and station. He was now destined to bear the remains of her, dead, for whom he had long been dying, and was now as near dying for her loss as he had before been for her love. The melancholy procession was marching slowly along, when it was met by the Marquis de Varenbon, who had been the sole occasion of it. We had not left Namur long when the Marquis reflected upon his cruel behaviour towards this unhappy young lady, and his passion (wonderful to relate) being revived by the absence of her, who inspired it, though scarcely alive while she was present he had resolved to come and ask her of her mother in marriage. He made no doubt, perhaps, of success, as he seldom failed in enterprises of love witness the great lady he has since obtained for a wife, in opposition to the will of her family. He might, besides, have flattered himself that he should easily have gained a pardon from her by whom he was beloved, according to the Italian proverb 'Che la forza d'amore non riguarda al delitto' (Lovers are not criminal in the estimation of one another). Accordingly the Marquis solicited Don John to be despatched to me on some errand, and arrived as I said before, at the very instant the corpse of this ill fated young lady was being borne to the grave. He was stopped by the crowd occasioned by this solemn procession. He contemplates it for some time. He observes a long train of persons in mourning and remarks the coffin to be covered with a white pall, and that there are chaplets of flowers laid upon the coffin. He enquires whose funeral it is. The answer he receives is, that it is the funeral of a young lady. Unfortunately for him, this reply fails to satisfy his curiosity. He makes up to one who led the pro cession, and eagerly asks the name of the young lady they are proceeding to bury. When, oh, fatal answer! Love, willing to revenge the victim of his ingratitude and neglect, suggests a reply which had nearly deprived him of life. He no sooner hears the name of Mademoiselle de Tournon pronounced than he falls from his horse in a swoon. He is taken up for dead, and conveyed to the nearest house, where he lies for a time insensible, his soul, no doubt, leaving his body to obtain pardon from her whom he had hastened to a premature grave, to return to taste the bitterness of death a second time.

Having performed the last offices to the remains of this poor young lady, I was unwilling to discompose the gaiety of the society assembled here on my account by any show of grief. Accordingly, I joined the bishop, or, as he is called, his Grace, and his canons, in their entertainments at different houses, and in gardens, of which the city and its neighbourhood afforded a variety. I was every morning attended by a numerous company to the garden, in which I drank the waters, the exercise of walking being recommended to be used with them. As the physician who advised me to take them was my own brother, they did not fail of their effect with me, and for these six or seven years which are gone over my head since I drank them, I have been free from any complaint of erysipelas on my arm. From this garden we usually proceeded to the place where we were invited to dinner. After dinner we were amused with a ball. From the ball we went to some convent, where we heard vespers. From vespers to supper, and that over, we had another ball or music on the river.

LETTER XVI

QUEEN MARGARET, ON HER RETURN FROM LIÈGE, IS IN DANGER OF BEING MADE A PRISONER—SHE ARRIVES, AFTER SOME NARROW ESCAPES, AT LA FÈRE

IN this manner we passed the six weeks, which is the usual time for taking these waters, at the expiration of which the Princess of Roche-sur-Yon was desirous to return to France, but Madame d'Aurec, who just then returned to us from Namur, on her way to rejoin her husband in Lorraine, brought us news of an extraordinary change of affairs in that town and province since we had passed through it.

It appeared from this lady's account that, on the very day we left Namur, Don John, after quitting the boat, mounted his horse under pretence of taking the diversion of hunting, and, as he passed the gate of the castle of Namur, expressed a desire of seeing it, that, having entered, he took possession of it, notwithstanding he held it for the States, agreeably to a convention Don John, moreover arrested the persons of the Duke d'Arscot and M<sup>d</sup> Aurec, and also made Madame d'Aurec a prisoner. After some remonstrances and entreaties, he had set her husband and brother in law at liberty, but detained her as a hostage for them. In consequence of these measures the whole country was in arms. The province of Namur was divided into three parties; the first whereof was that of the States, or the Catholic party of Flanders; the second that of the Prince of Orange and the Huguenots; the third, the Spanish party, of which Don John was the head.

By letters which I received just at this time from my brother, through the hands of a gentleman named Lescar, I found I was in great danger of falling into the hands of one or other of these parties.

These letters informed me that, since my departure from Court God had dealt favourably with my brother and enabled him to acquit himself of the command of the army confided to him, greatly to the benefit of the King's service so that he had taken all the towns and driven the Huguenots out of the provinces, agreeably to the design for which the army was raised; that he had returned to the Court at Poitiers, where the King stayed during the siege of Brouage, to be near to M. de Mayenne, in order to afford him whatever succours he stood in need of; that, as the Court is a Proteus, for ever putting on a new face, he had found it entirely changed, so that he had been no more considered than if he had done the King no service whatever, and that Bussi, who had been so graciously looked upon before and during this last war, had done great personal service, and had lost a brother at the storming of Issoire, was very coolly received, and even as maliciously persecuted as in the time of le Guast, in consequence of which either he or Bussi experienced some indignity or other. He further mentioned that the King's favourites had been practising with his most faithful servants, Maugiron, la Valette, Mauléon, and Hivarrot, and several other good and trusty men, to desert him, and enter into the King's service, and, lastly, that the King had repented of giving me leave to go to Flanders, and that, to counteract my brother, a plan was laid to intercept me on my return, either by the Spaniards, for which purpose they had been told that I had treated for delivering up the country to him or by the Huguenots, in revenge of the war my brother had carried on against them, after having formerly assisted them.

This intelligence required to be well considered as there seemed to be an utter impossibility of avoiding both parties. I had, however the pleasure to think that two of the principal persons of my company stood well, either with one or other party. The Cardinal de Lenoncourt had been thought to favour the Huguenot party and M Descarts brother to the Bishop of Lisleux, was supposed to have the Spanish interest at heart. I communicated our difficult situation to the Princess of Roche sur Yon and Madame de Tournon who, considering that we could not reach La Fère in less than five or six days, answered me, with tears in their eyes, that God only had it in His power to preserve us, that I should recommend myself to His protection, and then follow such measures as should seem advisable. They observed that, as one of them was in a weak state of health, and the other advanced in years, I might affect to make short journeys on their account, and they would put up with every inconvenience to extricate me from the danger I was in.

I next consulted with the Bishop of Laige, who most certainly acted towards me like a father, and gave directions to the grand master of his household to attend me with his horses as far as I should think proper. As it was necessary that we should have a passport from the Prince of Orange, I sent Mondoucet to him to obtain one, as he was acquainted with the Prince and was known to favour his religion. Mondoucet did not return, and I believe I might have waited for him until this time to no purpose. I was advised by the Cardinal de Lenoncourt and my first esquire, the Chevalier Salviati, who were of the same party, not to stir without a passport; but, as I suspected a plan was laid to entrap me, I resolved to set out the next morning.

They now saw that this pretence was insufficient to detain me, accordingly, the Chevalier Salviati prevailed with my treasurer, who was secretly a Huguenot, to declare he had not money enough in his hands to discharge the expenses we had incurred at Liège, and that, in consequence, my horses were detained. I afterwards discovered that this was false for, on my arrival at La Fère, I called for his accounts, and found he had then a balance in his hands which would have enabled him to pay the expenses of my family for six or seven weeks. The Princess of Roche sur Yon incensed at the affront put upon me, and seeing the danger I ran by staying, advanced the money that was required, to their great confusion, and I took my leave of his Grace the bishop presenting him with a diamond worth three thousand crowns, and giving his domestics gold chains and rings. Having thus taken our leave we proceeded to Huy, without any other passport than God's good providence.

This town as I observed before, belongs to the Bishop of Liège, but was now in a state of tumult and confusion on account of the general revolt of the Low Countries, the townsmen taking part with the Netherlanders notwithstanding the bishopric was a neutral State. On this account they paid no respect to the grand master of the bishop's household, who accompanied us, but, knowing Don John had taken the castle of Namur in order, as they supposed, to intercept me on my return, these brutal people, as soon as I had got into my quarters, rang the alarm bell, drew up their artillery, placed chains across the streets, and kept us thus confined and separated the whole night, giving us no opportunity to expostulate with them on such conduct. In the morning we were suffered to leave the town without further molestation, and the streets we passed through were lined with armed men.

From thence we proceeded to Dinant, where we intended to sleep; but, unfortunately for us, the townspeople had on that day chosen their burghermasters, a kind of officers like the consuls in Gascony and France. In consequence of this election, it was a day of tumult, riot, and debauchery; everyone in the town was drunk, no magistrate was acknowledged. In a word, all was in confusion. To render our situation still worse, the grand master of the bishop's household had formerly done the town some ill office, and was considered as its enemy. The people of the town, when in their sober senses, were inclined to favour the party of the States, but under the influence of Bacchus they paid no regard to any party not even to themselves.

As soon as I had reached the suburbs they were alarmed at the number of my company, quitted the bottle and glass to take up their arms, and immediately shut the gates against me. I had sent a gentleman before me, with my har binger and quartermasters, to beg the magistrates to admit me to stay one night in the town but I found my officers had been put under an arrest. They bawled out to us from within to tell us their situation but could not make themselves heard. At length I raised myself up in my litter and taking off my mask, made a sign to a townsman nearest me, of the best appearance, that I was desirous to speak with him. As soon as he drew near me, I begged him to call out for silence, which being with some difficulty obtained I represented to him who I was and the occasion of my journey that it was far from my intention to do them harm but, to prevent any suspicious of the kind, I only begged to be admitted to go into their city with my women, and as few others of my attendants as they thought proper, and that we might be permitted to stay there for one night, whilst the rest of my company remained within the suburbs.

They agreed to this proposal, and opened their gates for my admission. I then entered the city with the principal persons of my company, and the grand master of the bishop's household. This reverend personage, who was eighty years of age, and wore a beard as white as snow, which reached down to his girdle—this venerable old man, I say, was no sooner recognised by the drunken and armed rabble than he was accosted with the grossest abuse, and it was with difficulty they were restrained from laying violent hands upon him. At length I got him into my lodgings, but the mob fired at the house, the walls of which were only of plaster. Upon being thus attacked, I enquired for the master of the house, who, fortunately, was within. I entreated him to speak from the window, to someone without, to obtain permission for my being heard. I had some difficulty to get him to venture doing so. At length, after much bawling from the window, the burghermasters came to speak to me, but were so drunk that they scarcely knew what they said. I explained to them that I was entirely ignorant that the grand master of the bishops household was a person to whom they had a dislike, and I begged them to consider the consequences of giving offence to a person like me, who was a friend of the principal lords of the States, and I assured them that the Count de Lalain, in particular, would be greatly displeased when he should hear how I had been received there.

The name of the Count de Lalain produced an instant effect, much more than if I had mentioned all the sovereign princes I was related to. The principal person amongst them asked me, with some hesitation and stammering if I was really a particular friend of the Count's. Perceiving that to claim kindred with the Count would do me more service than being related to all the Powers in Christendom, I answered that I was both a friend and a relation. They then made me many apologies and congrâs, stretching forth their hands in token of friendship; in short, they now behaved with as much civility as before with rudeness. They begged my pardon for what had happened, and promised that the good old man, the grand master of the bishop's household, should be no more insulted, but be suffered to leave the city quietly, the next morning, with me.

As soon as morning came, and I was preparing to go to hear Mass, there arrived the King's agent to Don John, named du Bois, a man much attached to the Spanish interest. He informed me that he had received orders from the King my brother to conduct me in safety on my return. He said that he had prevailed on Don John to permit Barlemont to escort me to Namur with a troop of cavalry, and begged me to obtain leave of the citizens to admit Barlemont and his troop to enter the town, that they might receive my orders.

Thus had they concerted a double plot; the one to get possession of the town, the other of my person. I saw through the whole design, and consulted with the Cardinal de Lenoncourt, communicating to him my suspicions. The Cardinal was as unwilling to fall into the hands of the Spaniards as I could be, he therefore thought it advisable to acquaint the townspeople with the plot and make our escape from the city by another road in order to avoid meeting Barlemont's troop. It was agreed betwixt us that the Cardinal should keep du Bois in discourse, whilst I consulted the principal citizens in another apartment. Accordingly, I assembled as many as I could, to whom I represented that if they admitted Barlemont and his troop within the town, he would most certainly take possession of it for Don John. I gave it as my advice to make a show of defence, to declare they would not be taken by surprise and to offer to admit Barlemont and no one else, within their gates. They resolved to act according to my counsel and offered to serve me at the hazard of their lives. They promised to procure me a guide, who should conduct me by a road by following which, I should put the river betwixt me and Don John's forces whereby I should be out of his reach and could be lodged in houses and towns which were in the interest of the States only.

This point being settled I despatched them to give admission to M. de Barlemont, who, as soon as he entered within the gates, begged hard that his troop might come in likewise. Hereupon, the citizens flew into a violent rage, and were near putting him to death. They told him that if he did not order his men out of sight of the town, they would fire upon them with their great guns. This was done with design to give me time to leave the town before they could follow in pursuit of me. M. de Barlemont and the agent, du Bois, used every argument they could devise to persuade me to go to Namur, where they said Don John waited to receive me.

I appeared to give way to their persuasions, and, after hearing Mass and taking a hasty dinner, I left my lodgings, escorted by two or three hundred armed citizens, some of them engaging Barlemont and du Bois in conversation. We all took the way to the gate which opens to the river, and directly opposite to that leading to Namur. Du Bois and his colleague told me I was not going the right way, but I continued talking, and as if I did not hear them. But when we reached the gate I hastened into the boat, and my people after me. M. de Barlemont and the agent du Bois, calling out to me from the bank, told me I was doing very wrong and acting directly contrary to the King's intention, who had directed that I should return by way of Namur

In spite of all their remonstrances we crossed the river with all possible expedition, and, during the two or three crossings which were necessary to convey over the litters and horses, the citizens, to give me the more time to escape, were debating with Barlemont and du Bois concerning a number of grievances and complaints, telling them, in their coarse language, that Don John had broken the peace and falsified his engagements with the States, and they even rehearsed the old quarrel of the death of Egmont, and, lastly, declared that if the troop made its appearance before their walls again they would fire upon it with their artillery

I had by this means sufficient time to reach a secure distance and was, by the help of God and the assistance of my guide out of all apprehensions of danger from Barlemont and his troop

I intended to lodge that night in a strong castle, called Fleurines, which belonged to a gentle man of the party of the States, whom I had seen with the Count de Lalain. Unfortunately for me, the gentleman was absent, and his lady only was in the castle. The courtyard being open, we entered it, which put the lady into such a fright that she ordered the bridge to be drawn up, and fled to the strong tower.<sup>1</sup> Nothing we could say would induce her to give us entrance. In the meantime, three hundred gentlemen, whom Don John had sent off to intercept our passage, and take possession of the castle of Fleminnes, judging that I should take up my quarters there, made their appearance upon an eminence, at the distance of about a thousand yards. They, seeing our carriages in the courtyard, and supposing that we ourselves had taken to the strong tower, resolved to stay where they were that night, hoping to intercept me the next morning.

In this cruel situation were we placed, in a courtyard surrounded by a wall by no means strong, and shut up by a gate equally as weak and as capable of being forced, remonstrating from time to time with the lady, who was deaf to all our prayers and entreaties

---

<sup>1</sup> In the old French original, dongeon, whence we have dungeon.

Through God's mercy, her husband, M de Fleurines, himself appeared just as night approached. We then gained instant admission, and the lady was greatly reprimanded by her husband for her incivility and indiscreet behaviour. This gentleman had been sent by the Count de Lalain with directions to conduct me through the several towns belonging to the States, the Count himself not being able to leave the army of the States of which he had the chief command, to accompany me.

This was as favourable a circumstance for me as I could wish for, M de Fleurines offering to accompany me into France the towns we had to pass through being of the party of the States, we were everywhere quietly and honourably received. I had only the mortification of not being able to visit Mons, agreeably to my promise made to the Countess de Lalain not passing nearer to it than Nivelles, seven long leagues distant from it. The Count being at Antwerp, and the war being hottest in the neighbourhood of Mons I thus was prevented seeing either of them on my return. I could only write to the Countess by a servant of the gentleman who was now my conductor. As soon as she learned I was at Nivelles, she sent some gentlemen, natives of the part of Flanders I was in, with a strong injunction to see me safe on the frontier of France.

I had to pass through the Cambresis, partly in favour of Spain and partly of the States. Accordingly, I set out with these gentlemen, to lodge at the Château Cambresis. There they took leave of me, in order to return to Mons, and by them I sent the Countess a gown of mine, which had been greatly admired by her when I wore it at Mons; it was of black satin, curiously embroidered, and cost nine hundred crowns.

When I arrived at Château Cambresis, I had intelligence sent me that a party of the Huguenot troops had a design to attack me on the frontiers of Flanders and France. This intelligence I communicated to a few only of my company, and prepared to set off an hour before daybreak. When I sent for my litters and horses, I found much such a kind of delay from the Chevalier Salviati as I had before experienced at Liège, and suspecting it was done designedly, I left my litter behind and mounted on horseback, with such of my attendants as were ready to follow me. By this means, with God's assistance, I escaped being waylaid by my enemies, and reached Catelet at ten in the morning. From thence I went to my house at La Fère where I intended to reside until I learned that peace was concluded upon.

At La Fère I found a messenger in waiting from my brother, who had orders to return with all expedition as soon as I arrived and inform him of it. My brother wrote me word by that messenger, that peace was concluded, and the King returned to Paris that as to himself, his situation was rather worse than better that he and his people were daily receiving some affront or other and continual quarrels were excited betwixt the King's favourites and Bussy and my brother's principal attendants. This, he added, had made him impatient for my return, that he might come and visit me.

I sent his messenger back, and, immediately after my brother sent Bussy and all his household to Angers, and, taking with him fifteen or twenty attendants, he rode post to me at La Fère. It was a great satisfaction to me to see one whom I so tenderly loved and greatly honoured, once more. I consider it amongst the greatest felicities I ever enjoyed, and, accordingly, it became my chief study to make his residence here agreeable to him. He himself seemed delighted with his change of situation, and would willingly have continued in it longer had not the noble generosity of his mind called him forth to great achievements. The quiet of our Court, when compared with that he had just left, affected him so powerfully that he could not but express the satisfaction he felt by frequently exclaiming, "Oh, Queen! how happy I am with you. My God! your society is a paradise wherein I enjoy every delight, and I seem to have lately escaped from hell, with all its furies and tortures!"

LETTER XVII

GOOD EFFECTS OF QUEEN MARGARET'S NEGOTIATIONS IN FLANDERS—SHE OBTAINS LEAVE TO GO TO THE KING OF NAVARRE HER HUSBAND, BUT HER JOURNEY IS DELAYED—COURT INTRIGUES AND PLOTS—THE DUKE OF ALENCON AGAIN PUT UNDER ARREST

WE passed nearly two months together, which appeared to us only as so many days. I gave him an account of what I had done for him in Flanders, and the state in which I had left the business. He approved of the interview with the Connt de Lalain's brother, in order to settle the plan of operations and exchange assurances. Accordingly the Count de Montigny arrived, with four or five other leading men of the county of Hainault. One of these was charged with a letter from M d'Ainsi, offering his services to my brother, and assuring him of the citadel of Cambray. M de Montigny delivered his brother's declaration and engagement to give up the counties of Hainault and Artois, which included a number of fine cities. These offers made and accepted, my brother dismissed them with presents of gold medals, bearing his and my effigies, and every assurance of his future favour; and they returned to prepare everything for his coming. In the meanwhile my brother considered on the necessary measures to be used for raising a sufficient force, for which purpose he returned to the King, to prevail with him to assist him in this enterprise.

As I was anxious to go to Gascony, I made ready for the journey, and set off for Paris, my brother meeting me at the distance of one day's journey.

At Saint-Denis I was met by the King, the Queen my mother, Queen Louisa, and the whole Court. It was at Saint-Denis that I was to stop and dine, and there it was that I had the honour of the meeting I have just mentioned.

I was received very graciously, and most sumptuously entertained. I was made to recount the particulars of my triumphal journey to Liege, and perilous return. The magnificent entertainments I had received excited their admiration, and they rejoiced at my narrow escapes. With suchlike conversation I amused the Queen my mother and the rest of the company in her coach, on our way to Paris, where, supper and the ball being ended, I took an opportunity when I saw the King and the Queen my mother together, to address them

I expressed my hopes that they would not now oppose my going to the King my husband, that now, by the peace, the chief objection to it was removed, and if I delayed going in the present situation of affairs, it might be prejudicial and discreditable to me. Both of them approved of my request, and commended my resolution. The Queen my mother added that she would accompany me on my journey, as it would be for the King's service that she did so. She said the King must furnish me with the necessary means for the journey, to which he readily assented. I thought this a proper time to settle everything and prevent another journey to Court, which would be no longer pleasing after my brother left it, who was now pressing his expedition to Flanders with all haste. I therefore, begged the Queen my mother to recollect the promise she had made my brother and me as soon as peace was agreed upon, which was that, before my departure for Gascony, I should have my marriage portion assigned to me in lands. She said that she recollected it well, and the King thought it very reasonable, and promised that it should be done. I entreated that it might be concluded speedily, as I wished to set off, with their permission, at the beginning of the next month. This, too, was granted me, but granted after the mode of the Court; that is to say, notwithstanding my constant solicitations, instead of despatch, I experienced only delay; and thus it continued for five or six months in negotiation.

My brother met with the like treatment, though he was continually urging the necessity for his setting out for Flanders, and representing that his expedition was for the glory and advantage of France—for its glory, as such an enterprise would, like Piedmont, prove a school of war for the young nobility, wherein future Montlucs, Brissacs, Termes, and Bellegardes would be bred, all of them instructed in these wars, and afterwards, as field-m Marshals, of the greatest service to their King and country, and it would be for the advantage of France, as it would prevent civil wars, for Flanders would then be no longer a country wherunto such discontented spirits as aimed at novelty could assemble to brood over their malice and hatch plots for the disturbance of their native land

These representations, which were both reasonable and consonant with truth, had no weight when put into the scale against the envy excited by this advancement of my brother's fortune. Accordingly, every delay was used to hinder him from collecting his forces together and stop his expedition to Flanders. Bussi and his other dependents were offered a thousand indignities. Every stratagem was tried by day as well as by night, to pick quarrels with Bussi—now by Quélus at another time by Grammont—with the hope that my brother would engage in them. This was unknown to the King but Maugiron, who had engrossed the King's favour, and who had quitted my brother's service, sought every means to ruin him, as it is usual for those who have given offence to hate the offended party.

Thus did this man take every occasion to brave and insult my brother and relying upon the countenance and blind affection shown him by the King had leagued himself with Quélus, Saint-Luc, Saint-Maigrin, Grammont, Mauléon, Hivarrrot, and other young men who enjoyed the King's favour. As those who are favourites find a number of followers at Court, these licentious young courtiers thought they might do whatever they pleased. Some new dispute betwixt them and Bussi was constantly starting. Bussi had a degree of courage which knew not how to give way to anyone, and my brother, unwilling to give umbrage to the King, and foreseeing that such proceedings would not forward his expedition, to avoid quarrels and, at the same time, to promote his plans, resolved to despatch Bussi to his Duchy of Alençon, in order to discipline such troops as he should find there. My brother's amiable qualities excited the jealousy of Maugiron and the rest of his cabal about the King's person, and their dislike for Bussi was not so much on his own account as because he was strongly attached to my brother. The slights and disrespect shown to my brother were remarked by everyone at Court, but his prudence, and the patience natural to his disposition, enabled him to put up with their insults, in hopes of finishing the business of his Flemish expedition, which would remove him to a distance from them and their machinations. This persecution was the more mortifying and discreditable as it even extended to his servants, whom they strove to injure by every means they could employ. M de la Chastre at this time had a lawsuit of considerable consequence decided against him, because he had lately attached himself to my brother. At the instance of Maugiron and Saint Luc, the King was induced to solicit the cause in favour of Madame de S netaire, their friend. M de la Chastre, being greatly injured by it, complained to my brother of the injustice done him with all the concern such a proceeding may be supposed to have occasioned.

About this time Saint Luc's marriage was celebrated. My brother resolved not to be pr sent at it, and begged of me to join him in the same resolution. The Queen my mother was greatly uneasy on account of the behaviour of these young men, fearing that if my brother did not join them in this festivity, it might be attended with some bad consequence, especially as the day was likely to produce scenes of revelry and debauch; she, therefore, prevailed on the King to permit her to dine on the wedding-day at Saint-Maur, and take my brother and me with her. This was the day before Shrove Tuesday, and we returned in the evening, the Queen my mother having well lectured my brother, and made him consent to appear at the ball, in order not to displease the King.

But this rather served to make matters worse than better, for Maugiron and his party began to attack him with such insolent speeches as would have offended anyone of far less consequence. They said he needed not to have given himself the trouble of dressing, for he was not missed in the afternoon; but now, they supposed, he came at night as the most suitable time, with other allusions to the meanness of his figure and smallness of stature. All this was addressed to the bride, who sat near him, but spoken out on purpose that he might hear it. My brother, perceiving this was purposely said to provoke an answer and occasion his giving offence to the King, removed from his seat full of resentment, and, consulting merely a pretence to cover some treacherous design. I am going to put him and his people under an arrest, and have his papers examined. I am sure we shall make some great discoveries."

At the time he said this he had with him the Sieur de Coassé, captain of the guard, and a number of Scottish archers. The Queen my mother fearing, from the king's haste and trepidation, that some mischief might happen to my brother, begged to go with him. Accordingly, undressed as she was, wrapping herself up in a night gown, she followed the king to my brother's bed-chamber. The king knocked at the door with great violence, ordering it to be immediately opened, for that he was there himself. My brother started up in his bed, awakened by the noise, and, knowing that he had done nothing that he need fear, ordered Cangé his valet de chambre, to open the door. The king entered in a great rage, and asked him when he would have done plotting against him. "But I will show you," said he, "what it is to plot against your Sovereign. Hereupon he ordered the archers to take away all the trunks, and turn the valets de chambre out of the room. He searched my brother's bed himself, to see if he could find any papers concealed in it. My brother had that evening received a letter from Madame de Sauve, which he kept in his hand, unwilling that it should be seen. The King endeavoured to force it from him. He refused to part with it, and earnestly entreated the King would not insist upon seeing it. This only excited the King's anxiety the more to have it in his possession, as he now supposed it to be the key to the whole plot, and the very document which would at once bring conviction home to him. At length the King having got it into his hands, he opened it in the presence of the Queen my mother, and they were both as much confounded, when they read the contents, as Cato was when he obtained a letter from Cæsar, in the Senate, which the latter was unwilling to give up; and which Cato, supposing to contain a conspiracy against the Republic, found to be no other than a love-letter from his own sister.

But the shame of this disappointment served only to increase the King's anger, who, without condescending to make a reply to my brother,

LETTER XVIII

THE BROTHERS RECONCILED—ALENÇON RESTORED TO HIS LIBERTY

I WAS ignorant of what had happened to my brother, and when the Scottish archer came into my bed-chamber, I was still asleep. He drew the curtains of the bed, and told me, in his broken French, that my brother wished to see me. I stared at the man half awake as I was and thought it a dream. After a short pause, and being thoroughly awakened, I asked him if he was not a Scottish archer. He answered me in the affirmative. “What!” cried I, “has my brother no one else to send a message by?” He replied he had not, for all his domestics had been put under an arrest. He then proceeded to relate, as well as he could explain himself, the events of the preceding night, and the leave granted my brother for my being with him during his imprisonment.

The poor fellow, observing me to be much affected by this intelligence, drew near, and whispered me to this purport "Do not grieve yourself about this matter, I know a way of setting your brother at liberty, and you may depend upon it, that I will do it, but, in that case, I must go off with him." I assured him that he might rely upon being as amply rewarded as he could wish for such assistance, and, huddling on my clothes, I followed him alone to my brother's apartments. In going thither, I had occasion to traverse the whole gallery, which was filled with people, who, at another time, would have pressed forward to pay their respects to me; but, now that Fortune seemed to frown upon me, they all avoided me, or appeared as if they did not see me

Coming into my brother's apartments, I found him not at all affected by what had happened; for such was the constancy of his mind, that his arrest had wrought no change, and he received me with his usual cheerfulness. He ran to meet me, and taking me in his arms, he said. "Queen! I beg you to dry up your tears, in my present situation, nothing can grieve me so much as to find you under any concern, for my own part, I am so conscious of my innocence and the integrity of my conduct, that I can defy the utmost malice of my enemies. If I should chance to fall the victim of their injustice, my death would prove a more cruel punishment to them than to me, who have courage sufficient to meet it in a just cause. It is not death I fear, because I have tasted sufficiently of the calamities and evils of life, and am ready to leave this world, which I have found only the abode of sorrow, but the circumstance I dread most is, that, not finding me sufficiently guilty to doom me to death, I shall be condemned to a long solitary imprisonment, though I should even despise their tyranny in that respect, could I not have the assurance of being comforted by your presence. These words, instead of stopping my tears only served to make them stream afresh. I answered, sobbing that my life and fortune were at his devotion, that the power of God alone could prevent me from affording him my assistance under every extremity that, if he should be transported from that place, and I should be withheld from following him, I would kill myself on the spot.

Changing our discourse, we framed a number of conjectures on what might be the probable cause of the King's angry proceedings against him, but found ourselves at a loss what to assign them to. Whilst we were discussing this matter the hour came for opening the palace gates, when a simple young man belonging to Bussi presented himself for entrance. Being stopped by the guard and questioned as to whither he was going, he, panic-struck, replied he was going to M. de Bussi, his master. This answer was carried to the King, and gave fresh ground for suspicion. It seems my brother, supposing he should not be able to go to Flanders for some time, and resolving to send Bussi to his Duchy of Alençon, as I have already mentioned, had lodged him in the Louvre, that he might be near him to take instructions at every opportunity.

L'Archant, the general of the guard, had received the King's commands to make a search in the Louvre for him and Simier, and put them both under arrest. He entered upon this business with great unwillingness, as he was intimate with Bussi, who was accustomed to call him "father." L'Archant, going to Simier's apartment, arrested him and though he judged Bussi was there too, yet, being unwilling to find him, he was going away. Bussi, however, who had concealed himself under the bed, as not knowing to whom the orders for his arrest might be given finding he was to be left there, and sensible that he should be well treated by L'Archant, called out to him, as he was leaving the room, in his droll manner

'What, papa, are you going without me? Don't you think I am as great a rogue as that Simier?'

"Ah son, replied L'Archant, "I would much rather have lost my arm than have met with you! Bussi, being a man devoid of all fear, observed that it was a sign that things went well with him, then turning to Simier who stood trembling with fear, he jeered him upon his pusillanimity. L'Archant removed them both and set a guard over them, and, in the next place, proceeded to arrest M de la Chastre, whom he took to the Bastille.

Meanwhile M de l'Oste was appointed to the command of the guard which was set over my brother. This was a good sort of old man who had been appointed governor to the King

my husband, and loved me as if I had been his own child. Sensible of the injustice done to my brother and me, and lamenting the bad counsel by which the King was guided, and being, moreover, willing to serve us, he resolved to deliver my brother from his arrest. In order to make his intention known to us he ordered the Scottish archers to wait on the stairs without, keeping only two in the room whom he could trust. Then taking me aside, he said "There is not a good Frenchman living who does not bleed at his heart to see what we see. I have served the King your father, and I am ready to lay down my life to serve his children. I expect to have the guard of the Prince your brother, wherever he shall chance to be confined; and, depend upon it, at the hazard of my life, I will restore him to his liberty. But," added he, "that no suspicions may arise that such is my design, it will be proper that we be not seen together in conversation; however, you may rely upon my word." This afforded me great consolation, and, assuming a degree of courage hereupon, I observed to my brother that we ought not to remain there without knowing for what reason we were detained, as if we were in the Inquisition, and that to treat us in such a manner was to consider us as persons of no account. I then begged M de l'Oste to entreat the King, in our name, if the Queen our mother was not permitted to come to us to send some one to acquaint us with the crime for which we were kept in confinement.

M de Combaut who was at the head of the young counsellors, was accordingly sent to us, and he with a great deal of gravity, informed us that he came from the King to enquire what it was we wished to communicate to His Majesty. We answered that we wished to speak to someone near the King's person in order to our being informed what we were kept in confinement for, as we were unable to assign any reason for it ourselves. He answered, with great solemnity, that we ought not to ask of God or the King reasons for what they did, as all their actions emanated from wisdom and justice. We replied that we were not persons to be treated like those shut up in the Inquisition who are left to guess at the cause of their being there.

We could obtain from him, after all we said, no other satisfaction than his promise to interest himself in our behalf, and to do us all the service in his power. At this my brother broke out into a fit of laughter, but I confess I was too much alarmed to treat his message with such indifference, and could scarcely refrain from talking to this messenger as he deserved.

Whilst he was making his report to the King, the Queen my mother kept her chamber, being under great concern, as may well be supposed, to witness such proceedings. She plainly foresaw, in her prudence, that these excesses would end fatally, should the mildness of my brother's disposition, and his regard for the welfare of the State, be once wearied out with submitting to such repeated acts of injustice. She, therefore, sent for the senior members of the council, the chancellor, princes, lords and marshals of France, who all were greatly scandalised at the bad counsel which had been given to the King, and told the Queen my mother that she ought to remonstrate with the King upon the injustice of his proceedings. They observed that what had been done could not now be recalled, but matters might yet be set upon a right footing. Tho Queen my mother hereupon went to the king, followed by these counsellors, and represented to him the ill consequences which might proceed from the steps he had taken.

The king's eyes were by this time opened, and he saw that he had been ill advised. He therefore, begged the Queen my mother to set things to rights, and to prevail on my brother to forget all that had happened, and to bear no resentment against these young men, but to make up the breach betwixt Bussi and Quélus.

Things being thus set to rights again the guard which had been placed over my brother was dismissed, and the Queen my mother, coming to his apartment, told him he ought to return thanks to God for his deliverance, for that there had been a moment when even she herself despaired of saving his life. that, since he must now have discovered that the king's temper of mind was such that he took the alarm at the very imagination of danger, and that, when once he was resolved upon a measure, no advice that she or any other could give would prevent him from putting it into execution, she would recommend it to him to submit himself to the King's pleasure in everything, in order to prevent the like in future, and, for the present, to take the earliest opportunity of seeing the King, and to appear as if he thought no more about the past.

We replied that we were both of us sensible of God's great mercy in delivering us from the injustice of our enemies, and that, next to God, our greatest obligation was to her, but that my brother's rank did not admit of his being put in confinement without cause, and released from it again without the formality of an acknowledgment. Upon this, the Queen observed that it was not in the power even of God Himself to undo what had been done; that what could be effected to save his honour, and give him satisfaction for the irregularity of the arrest, should have place. My brother, therefore, she observed, ought to strive to mollify the King by addressing him with expressions of regard to his person and attachment to his service, and, in the meantime, use his influence over Bussi to reconcile him to Quélus, and to end all disputes betwixt them. She then declared that the principal motive for putting my brother and his servants under arrest was to prevent the combat for which old Bussi, the brave father of a brave son had solicited the King's leave wherein he proposed to be his son's second, whilst the father of Quélus was to be his. These four had agreed in this way to determine the matter in dispute, and give the Court no further disturbance.

My brother now engaged himself to the Queen that, as Bussi would see he could not be permitted to decide his quarrel by combat, he should, in order to deliver himself from his arrest do as she had commanded.

The Queen my mother going down to the King, prevailed with him to restore my brother to liberty with every honour. In order to which the King came to her apartment followed by the princes lords, and other members of the council and sent for us by M. de Villequier. As we went along we found all the rooms crowded with people who, with tears in their eyes blessed God for our deliverance. Coming into the apartments of the Queen my mother we found the King attended as I before related. The King desired my brother not to take anything ill that had been done, as the motive for it was his concern for the good of his kingdom and not any bad intention towards himself. My brother replied that he had, as he ought, devoted his life to his service, and, therefore, was governed by his pleasure, but that he most humbly begged him to consider that his fidelity and attachment did not merit the return he had met with, that, notwithstanding, he should impute it entirely to his own ill-fortune, and should be perfectly satisfied if the King acknowledged his innocence. Hereupon the King said that he entertained not the least doubt of his innocence, and only desired him to believe he held the same place in his esteem he ever had. The Queen my mother then, taking both of them by the hand, made them embrace each other.

Afterwards the King commanded Bussi to be brought forth, to make a reconciliation betwixt him and Quélus, giving orders, at the same time, for the release of Simier and M<sup>re</sup> de la Chastie. Bussi coming into the room with his usual grace, the King told him he must be reconciled with Quélus, and forbade him to say a word more concerning their quarrel. He then commanded them to embrace. Sire, said Bussi, "if it is your pleasure that we kiss and are friends again I am ready to obey your command. then, putting himself in the attitude of Pantaloon, he went up to Quélus and gave him a hug which set all present in a titter, notwithstanding they had been seriously affected by the scene which had passed just before.

Many persons of discretion thought what had been done was too slight a reparation for the injuries my brother had received. When all was over the King and the Queen my mother coming up to me, said it would be incumbent on me to use my utmost endeavours to prevent my brother from calling to mind anything past which should make him swerve from the duty and affection he owed the King. I replied that my brother was so prudent and so strongly attached to the King's service that he needed no admonition on that head from me nor anyone else and that, with respect to myself I had never given him any other advice than to conform himself to the King's pleasure and the duty he owed him.

second storey and opened to the ditch, for the gates were so closely watched that it was impossible to pass them, the face of everyone going out of the Louvre being curiously examined. He begged of me, therefore, to procure for him a rope of sufficient strength and long enough for the purpose. This I set about immediately for having the macking of a bed that wanted mending, I sent it out of the palace by a lad whom I could trust, with orders to bring it back repaired, and to wrap up the proper length of rope inside.

When all was prepared one evening at supper time, I went to the Queen my mother, who supped alone in her own apartment it being fast day and the King eating no supper. My brother who on most occasions was patient and discreet spurred on by the indignities he had received and anxious to extricate himself from danger and regain his liberty, came to me as I was rising from table, and whispered to me to make haste and come to him in my own apartment. M. de Matignon at that time a marshal a sly cunning Norman, and one who had no love for my brother whether he had some knowledge of his design from some one who could not keep a secret, or only guessed at it, observed to the Queen my mother as she left the room (which I overheard, being near her, and circumspectly watching every word and motion, as may well be imagined, situated as I was betwixt fear and hope, and involved in perplexity) that my brother had undoubtedly an intention of withdrawing himself, and would not be there the next day; adding that he was assured of it, and she might take her measures accordingly.

I observed that she was much disconcerted by this observation, and I had my fears lest we should be discovered. When we came into her closet, she drew me aside and asked if I heard what Matignon had said. I replied "I did not hear it, madam, but I observe that it has given you uneasiness."—"Yes," said she, "a great deal of uneasiness, for you know I have pledged myself to the King that your brother shall not depart hence, and Matignon has declared that he knows very well he will not be here to-morrow." I now found myself under a great embarrassment, I was in danger either of proving unfaithful to my brother, and thereby bringing his life into jeopardy, or of being obliged to declare that to be truth which I knew to be false, and this I would have died rather than be guilty of

In this extremity, if I had not been aided by God my countenance, without speaking, would plainly have discovered what I wished to conceal. But God, who assists those who mean well and whose divine goodness was discoverable in my brother's escape, enabled me to compose my looks and suggested to me such a reply as gave her to understand no more than I wished her to know and cleared my conscience from making any declaration contrary to the truth. I answered her in these words "You cannot, madam, but be sensible that M. de Matignon is not one of my brother's friends, and that he is, besides, a busy meddling kind of man, who is sorry to find a reconciliation has taken place with us and, as to my brother, I will answer for him with my life in case he goes hence, of which, if he had any design I should, as I am well assured, not be ignorant he never having yet concealed any thing he meant to do from me

All this was said by me with the assurance that, after my brother's escape, they would not dare to do me any injury; and in case of the worst, and when we should be discovered, I had much rather pledge my life than hazard my soul by a false declaration, and endanger my brother's life. Without scrutinising into the import of my speech, she replied: "Remember what you now say—you will be bound for him on the penalty of your life." I smiled and answered that such was my intention. Then, wishing her a good night, I retired to my own bed-chamber, where, undressing myself in haste and getting into bed, in order to dismiss the ladies and maids-of-honour, and there then remaining only my chamber women, my brother came in, accompanied by Simier and Cagé. Rising from my bed, we made the cord fast, and having looked out at the window to discover if anyone was in the ditch, with the assistance of three of my women, who slept in my room, and the lad who had brought in the rope, we let down my brother, who laughed and joked upon the occasion without the least apprehension, notwithstanding the height was considerable. We next lowered Simier into the ditch, who was in such a fright that he had scarcely strength to hold the rope fast, and lastly descended my brother's valet de chambre, Cangé

Through God's providence my brother got off undiscovered, and going to Sainte Geneviève, he found Bussi waiting there for him. By consent of the abbot, a hole had been made in the city wall through which they passed, and horses being provided and in waiting, they mounted, and reached Angers without the least accident.

Whilst we were lowering down Cangé who, as I mentioned before was the last we observed a man rising out of the ditch who ran towards the lodge adjoining to the tennis-court, in the direct way leading to the guard house. I had no apprehensions on my own account all my fears being absorbed by those I entertained for my brother, and now I was almost dead with alarm supposing this might be a spy placed there by M de Matignon and that my brother would be taken. Whilst I was in this cruel state of anxiety, which can only be judged of by those who have experienced a similar situation my women took a precaution for my safety and their own, which did not suggest itself to me. This was to burn the rope, that it might not appear to our conviction in case the man in question had been placed there to watch us. This rope occasioned so great a flame in burning, that it set fire to the chimney, which, being seen from without, alarmed the guard, who ran to us, knocking violently at the door, calling for it to be opened.

I now concluded that my brother was stopped, and that we were both undone. However, as, by the blessing of God and through His divine mercy alone, I have, amidst every danger with which I have been repeatedly surrounded, constantly preserved a presence of mind which directed what was best to be done, and observing that the rope was not more than half consumed, I told my women to go to the door, and speaking softly, as if I was asleep, to ask the men what they wanted. They did so, and the archers replied that the chimney was on fire, and they came to extinguish it. My women answered it was of no consequence, and they could put it out themselves, begging them not to awake me. This alarm thus passed off quietly, and they went away, but, in two hours afterwards, M de Cossé came for me to go to the King and the Queen my mother, to give them an account of my brother's escape, of which they had received intelligence by the Abbot of Sainte-Geneviève.

1

It seems it had been concerted betwixt my brother and the abbot, in order to prevent the latter from falling under disgrace, that, when my brother might be supposed to have reached a sufficient distance the abbot should go to Court and say that he had been put into confinement whilst the hole was being made, and that he came to inform the King as soon as he had released himself.

I was in bed, for it was yet night and rising hastily, I put on my night-clothes. One of my women was indiscreet enough to hold me round the waist, and exclaim aloud, shedding a flood of tears, that she should never see me more. M de Cossé pushing her away, said to me ' If I was not a person thoroughly devoted to your service, this woman has said enough to bring you into trouble. But continued he, "fear nothing God be praised, by this time the Prince your brother is out of danger."

These words were very necessary, in the present state of my mind, to fortify it against the reproaches and threats I had reason to expect from the King. I found him sitting at the foot of the Queen my mother's bed, in such a violent rage that I am inclined to believe I should have felt the effects of it, had he not been restrained by the absence of my brother and my mother's presence. They both told me that I had assured them my brother would not leave the Court, and that I pledged myself for his stay. I replied that it was true that he had deceived me, as he had them; however, I was ready still to pledge my life that his departure would not operate to the prejudice of the King's service, and that it would appear he was only gone to his own principality to give orders and forward his expedition to Flanders.

The King appeared to be somewhat mollified by this declaration, and now gave me permission to return to my own apartments. Soon afterwards he received letters from my brother, containing assurances of his attachment, in the terms I had before expressed This caused a cessation of complaints, but by no means removed the king's dissatisfaction, who made a show of affording assistance to his expedition, but was secretly using every means to frustrate and defeat it

LETTER XX

QUEEN MARGARET PERMITTED TO GO TO THE KING HER HUSBAND—IS ACCOMPANIED BY THE QUEEN-MOTHER—MARGARET INSULTED BY HER HUSBAND'S SECRETARY—SHE HARBOURS JEALOUSY—HER ATTENTION TO THE KING HER HUSBAND DURING AN INDISPOSITION—THEIR RECONCILIATION—THE WAR BREAKS OUT AFRESH—AFFRONT RECEIVED FROM MARSHAL DE BIRON.

I NOW renewed my application for leave to go to the King my husband, which I continued to press on every opportunity. The King, perceiving that he could not refuse my leave any longer, was willing I should depart satisfied. He had this further view in complying with my wishes, that by this means he should withdraw me from my attachment to my brother. He, therefore, strove to oblige me in every way he could think of, and, to fulfil the promise made by the Queen my mother at the Peace of Sens, he gave me an assignment of my portion in territory, with the power of nomination to all vacant benefices and all offices, and, a cautionary town, and the country not being sufficiently quieted, she was permitted to go no further

It was the intention of the Queen my mother to make but a short stay, but so many accidents arose from disputes betwixt the Huguenots and Catholics, that she was under the necessity of stopping there eighteen months. As this was very much against her inclination she was sometimes inclined to think there was a design to keep her, in order to have the company of her maids-of honour. For my husband had been greatly smitten with Dayelle, and M. de Thurène was in love with la Vergne. However, I received every mark of honour and attention from the King that I could expect or desire. He related to me, as soon as we met, the artifices which had been put in practice whilst he remained at Court to create a misunderstanding betwixt him and me, all this, he said, he knew was with a design to cause a rupture betwixt my brother and him, and thereby ruin us all three, as there was an exceeding great jealousy entertained of the friendship which existed betwixt us.

We remained in the disagreeable situation I have before described all the time the Queen my mother stayed in Gascony; but, as soon as she could re-establish peace, she, by desire of the King my husband, removed the King's lieutenant, the Marquis de Villars, putting in his place the Marshal de Biron. She then departed for Languedoc, and we conducted her to Castelnaudary, where, taking our leave, we returned to Pau, in Béarn, in which place, the Catholic religion not being tolerated, I was only allowed to have Mass celebrated in a chapel of about three or four feet in length, and so narrow that it could scarcely hold seven or eight persons. During the celebration of Mass, the bridge of the castle was drawn up to prevent the Catholics of the town and country from coming to assist at it, who having been, for some years, deprived of the benefit of following their own mode of worship, would have gladly been present. Actuated by so holy and laudable a desire, some of the inhabitants of Pau, on Whitsunday, found means to get into the castle before the bridge was drawn up, and were present at the celebration of Mass, not being discovered until it was nearly over. At length the Huguenots espied them, and ran to acquaint le Pin, secretary to the King my husband, who was greatly in his favour, and who conducted the whole business relating to the new religion. Upon receiving this intelligence, le Pin ordered the guard to arrest these poor people, who were severely beaten in my presence, and afterwards locked up in prison, whence they were not released without paying a considerable fine.

This indignity gave me great offence, as I never expected anything of the kind. Accordingly I complained of it to the King my husband, begging him to give orders for the release of these poor Catholics, who did not deserve to be punished for coming to my chapel to hear Mass, a celebration of which they had been so long deprived of the benefit. Le Pin, with the greatest disrespect to his master, took upon him to reply without waiting to hear what the King had to say. He told me that I ought not to trouble the King my husband about such matters, that what had been done was very right and proper, that those people had justly merited the treatment they met with, and all I could say would go for nothing, for it must be so, and that I ought to rest satisfied with being permitted to have Mass said to me and my servants. This insolent speech from a person of his inferior condition incensed me greatly, and I entreated the King my husband, if I had the least share in his good graces, to do me justice, and avenge the insult offered me by this low man.

The King my husband, perceiving that I was offended, as I had reason to be, with this gross indignity, ordered le Pin to quit our presence immediately; and, expressing his concern at his secretary's behaviour, who, he said, was over zealous in the cause of religion, he promised that he would make an example of him. As to the Catholic prisoners, he said he would advise with his parliament what ought to be done for my satisfaction.

Having said this he went to his closet, where he found le Pin, who, by dint of persuasion, made him change his resolution, insomuch that, fearing I should insist upon his dismissing his secretary, he avoided meeting me. At last, finding that I was firmly resolved to leave him unless he dismissed le Piu he took advice of some persons who, having themselves a dislike to the secretary represented that he ought not to give me cause of displeasure for the sake of a man of his small importance, especially one who like him, had given me just reason to be offended that, when it became known to the King my brother and the Queen my mother, they would certainly take it ill that he had not only not resented it but on the contrary still kept him near his person

This counsel prevailed with him and he at length discarded his secretary The King, however, continued to behave to me with great coolness, being influenced, as he afterwards confessed, by the counsel of M de Pibrac, who acted the part of a double dealer telling me that I ought not to pardon an affront offered by such a mean fellow, but insist upon his being dismissed whilst he persuaded the King my husband that there was no reason for parting with a man so useful to him for such a trivial cause This was done by M de Pibrac thinking I might be induced, from such mortifications to return to France, where he enjoyed the offices of president and King's counsellor.

I now met with a fresh cause for disquietude in my present situation, for, Dayelle being gone, the King my husband placed his affections on Rebours. She was an artful young person, and had no regard for me; accordingly, she did me all the ill offices in her power with him. In the midst of these trials, I put my trust in God, and He, moved with pity by my tears, gave permission for our leaving Pau, that "little Geneva", and, fortunately for me, Rebours was taken ill and stayed behind. The King my husband no sooner lost sight of her than he forgot her, he now turned his eyes and attention towards Fosseuse. She was much handsomer than the other, and was at that time young, and really a very amiable person.

Pursuing the road to Montauban, we stopped at a little town called Eause, where, in the night, the King my husband was attacked with a high fever, accompanied with most violent pains in his head. This fever lasted for seventeen days, during which time he had no rest night or day, but was continually removed from one bed to another. I nursed him the whole time, never stirring from his bedside, and never putting off my clothes. He took notice of my extraordinary tenderness and spoke of it to several persons, and particularly to my cousin M —, who, acting the part of an affectionate relation, restored me to his favour, insomuch that I never stood so highly in it before. Thus happiness I had the good fortune to enjoy during the four or five years that I remained with him in Gascony.

Our residence, for the most part of the time I have mentioned, was at Nérac, where our Court was so brilliant that we had no cause to regret our absence from the Court of France. We had with us the Princess of Navarre my husband's sister since married to the Duke of Bar there were besides a number of ladies belonging to myself. The King my husband was attended by a numerous body of lords and gentlemen all as gallant persons as I have seen in any Court and we had only to lament that they were Huguenots. This difference of religion however, caused no dispute amongst us the King my husband and the Princess his sister heard a sermon whilst I and my servants heard Mass. I had a chapel in the park for the purpose, and, as soon as the service of both religions was over, we joined company in a beautiful garden, ornamented with long walks shaded with laurel and cypress trees. Sometimes we took a walk in the park and on the banks of the river, bordered by an avenue of trees three thousand yards in length. The rest of the day was passed in innocent amusements; and in the afternoon, or at night, we commonly had a ball.

The King was very assiduous with Fosseuse, who, being dependent on me, kept herself within the strict bounds of honour and virtue. Had she always done so, she had not brought upon herself a misfortune which has proved of such fatal consequence to myself as well as to her.

But our happiness was too great to be of long continuance, and fresh troubles broke out betwixt the King my husband and the Catholics, and gave rise to a new war. The King my husband and the Marshal de Biron, who was the King's lieutenant in Guienne, had a difference, which was aggravated by the Huguenots. This breach became in a short time so wide that all my efforts to close it were useless. They made their separate complaints to the King. The King my husband insisted on the removal of the Marshal de Biron, and the marshal charged the King my husband and the rest of those who were of the pretended reformed religion, with designs contrary to peace. I saw with great concern that affairs were likely soon to come to an open rupture and I had no power to prevent it. The marshal advised the King to come to Guienne himself, saying that in his presence, matters might be settled. The Huguenots, hearing of this proposal supposed the King would take possession of their towns, and thereupon came to a resolution to take up arms. Thus was what I feared. I was become a sharer in the King my husband's fortune, and was now to be in opposition to the King my brother and the religion I had been bred up in. I gave my opinion upon this war to the King my husband and his council and strove to dissuade them from engaging in it. I represented to them the hazards of carrying on a war when they were to be opposed against so able a general as the Marshal de Biron, who would not spare them as other generals had done, being their private enemy. I begged them to consider that, if the King brought his whole force against them, with intention to exterminate their religion, it would not be in their power to oppose or prevent it. But they were so headstrong, and so blinded with the hope of succeeding in the surprise of certain towns in Languedoc and Gascony, that, though the King did me the honour, upon all occasions, to listen to my advice, as did most of the Huguenots, yet I could not prevail on them to follow it in the present situation of affairs, until it was too late, and after they had found, to their cost, that my counsel was good. The torrent was now burst forth, and there was no possibility of stopping its course until it had spent its utmost strength

Before that period arrived, foreseeing the consequences, I had often written to the King and the Queen my mother, to offer something to the King my husband by way of accommodating matters. But they were bent against it, and seemed to be pleased that matters had taken such a turn, being assured by Marshal de Biron that he had it in his power to crush the Huguenots whenever he pleased.

In this crisis my advice was not attended to, the dissensions increased, and recourse was had to arms. The Huguenots had reckoned upon a force more considerable than they were able to collect together, and the King my husband found himself outnumbered by Marshal de Biron. In consequence, those of the pretended reformed religion failed in all their plans except their attack upon Cahors which they took with petards, after having lost a great number of men, M de Vezins, who commanded in the town, disputing their entrance for two or three days, from street to street, and even from house to house. The King my husband displayed great valour and conduct upon the occasion and showed himself to be a gallant and brave general. Though the Huguenots succeeded in this attempt, their loss was so great that they gained nothing from it. Marshal de Biron kept the field and took every place that declared for the Huguenots putting all that opposed him to the sword.

From the commencement of this war, the King my husband doing me the honour to love me and commanding me not to leave him, I had resolved to share his fortune, not without extreme regret, in observing that this war was of such a nature that I could not, in conscience, wish success to either side, for if the Huguenots got the upper hand, the religion which I cherished as much as my life was lost, and if the Catholics prevailed, the King my husband was undone. But, being thus attached to my husband, by the duty I owed him, and obliged by the attentions he was pleased to show me, I could only acquaint the King and the Queen my mother with the situation to which I was reduced, occasioned by my advice to them not having been attended to. I, therefore, prayed them, if they could not extinguish the flames of war in the midst of which I was placed, at least to give orders to Marshal de Biron to consider the town I resided in, and three leagues round it, as neutral ground, and that I would get the King my husband to do the same. This the King granted me for Nérac, provided my husband was not there; but if he should enter it, the neutrality was to cease, and so to remain as long as he continued there. This convention was observed, on both sides, with all the exactness I could desire. However, the King my husband was not to be prevented from often visiting Nérac, which was the residence of his sister and me. He was fond of the society of ladies, and moreover, was at that time greatly enamoured with Fosseuse, who held the place in his affections which Rebours had lately occupied. Fosseuse did me no ill offices, so that the King my husband and I continued to live on very good terms especially as he perceived me unwilling to oppose his inclinations.

Led by such inducements, he came to Nérac, once, with a body of troops, and stayed three days, not being able to leave the agreeable company he found there. Marshal de Biron who wished for nothing so much as such an opportunity, was apprised of it, and under pretence of joining M de Cornusson the seneschal of Toulouse, who was expected with a reinforcement for his army, he began his march but, instead of pursuing the road, according to the orders he had issued he suddenly ordered his troops to file off towards Nérac, and before nine in the morning, his whole force was drawn up within sight of the town and within cannon shot of it.

The King my husband had received intelligence, the evening before, of the expected arrival of M. de Cornusson, and was desirous of preventing the junction, for which purpose he resolved to attack him and the marshal separately. As he had been lately joined by M. de la Rochefoucauld, with a corps of cavalry consisting of eight hundred men, formed from the nobility of Saintonge, he found himself sufficiently strong to undertake such a plan. He, therefore, set out before break of day to make his attack as they crossed the river. But his intelligence did not prove to be correct, for de Cornusson passed it the evening before. My husband, being thus disappointed in his design, returned to Nérac, and entered at one gate just as Marshal de Biron drew up his troops before the other. There fell so heavy a rain at that moment that the musketry was of no use. The King my husband, however, threw a body of his troops into a vineyard to stop the marshal's progress, not being able to do more on account of the unfavourableness of the weather.

In the meantime, the marshal continued with his troops drawn up in order of battle, permitting only two or three of his men to advance, who

LETTER XXI

SITUATION OF AFFAIRS IN FLANDERS—PEACE BROUGHT ABOUT BY DUKE ALBNÇONS NEGOTIATION—MARSHAL DE BIRON APOLOGISES FOR FIRINO ON NÉRAC—HENRY DESPERATELY IN LOVE WITH FOSSEUSE—QUEEN MARGARET DISCOVERS FOSSEUSE TO BE PREGNANT, WHICH SHE DENIES—FOSSEUSE IN LABOUR—MARGARET'S GENEROUS BEHAVIOUR TO HER—MARGARET'S RETURN TO PARIS

THE war lasted some time longer, but with disadvantage to the Huguenots. The King my husband at length became desirous to make a peace. I wrote on the subject to the King and the Queen my mother but so elated were they both with Marshal de Biron's success, that they would not agree to any terms.

About the time this war broke out Cambray, which had been delivered up to my brother by M<sup>r</sup> d'Ainsi, according to his engagement with me, as I have before related was besieged by the forces of Spain. My brother received the news of this siege at his castle of Plessis-les-Tours, whither he had retired after his return from Flanders, where, by the assistance of the Count de Lalain, he had been invested with the government of Mons, Valenciennes, and their dependencies.

My brother, being anxious to relieve Cambray, set about raising an army with all the expedition he was able; but, finding it could not be accomplished very speedily, he sent forward a reinforcement under the command of M. de Balagny, to succour the place until he arrived himself with a sufficient force to raise the siege. Whilst he was in the midst of these preparations this Huguenot war broke out, and the men he had raised left him to incorporate themselves with the King's army, which had reached Gascony.

My brother was now without hope of raising the siege, and to lose Cambray would be attended with the loss of the other countries he had just obtained. Besides, what he should regret more, such losses would reduce to great straits M. de Balagny and the gallant troops so nobly defending the place.

His grief on this occasion was poignant, and, as his excellent judgment furnished him with expedients under all his difficulties, he resolved to endeavour at bringing about a peace. Accordingly he despatched a gentleman to the King with his advice to accede to terms, offering to undertake the treaty himself. His design in offering himself as negotiator was to prevent the treaty being drawn out to too great a length, as might be the case if confided to others. It was necessary that he should speedily relieve Cambray, for M de Balagny, who had thrown himself into the city as I have before mentioned, had written to him that he should be able to defend the place for six months, but, if he received no succours within that time, his provisions would be all expended, and he should be obliged to give way to the clamours of the inhabitants, and surrender the town.

By God's favour the King was induced to listen to my brother's proposal of undertaking a negotiation for a peace. The King hoped thereby to disappoint him in his expectations in Flanders, which he never had approved of. Accordingly he sent word back to my brother that he should accept his proffer of negotiating a peace, and would send him for his coadjutors, M. de Villeroy and M. de Bellhèvre. The commission my brother was charged with succeeded, and, after a stay of seven months in Gascony, he settled a peace and left us, his thoughts being employed during the whole time on the means of relieving Cambray, which the satisfaction he found in being with us could not altogether abate.

The peace my brother made, as I have just mentioned, was so judiciously framed that it gave equal satisfaction to the King and the Catholics, and to the King my husband and the Huguenots, and obtained him the affections of both parties. He likewise acquired from it the assistance of that able general, Marshal de Biron, who undertook the command of the army destined to raise the siege of Cambray. The King my husband was equally gratified in the marshal's removal from Gascony and having Marshal de Matignon in his room.

Before my brother set off he was desirous to bring about a reconciliation betwixt the King my husband and Marshal de Biron, provided the latter should make his apologies to me for his conduct at Nérac. My brother had desired me to treat him with all disdain, but I used this hasty advice with discretion, considering that my brother might one day or other repent having given it, as he had everything to hope, in his present situation, from the bravery of this officer

My brother returned to France accompanied by Marshal de Biron. By his negotiation of a peace he had acquired to himself great credit with both parties, and secured a powerful force for the purpose of raising the siege of Cambray. But honours and success are followed by envy. The King beheld this accession of glory to his brother with great dissatisfaction. He had been for seven months while my brother and I were together in Gascony brooding over his malice, and produced the strangest invention that can be imagined. He pretended to believe (what the King my husband can easily prove to be false) that I instigated him to go to war that I might procure for my brother the credit of making peace. This is not at all probable when it is considered the prejudice my brother's affairs in Flanders sustained by the war. But envy and malice are self-deceivers, and pretend to discover what no one else can perceive. On this frail foundation the King raised an altar of hatred, on which he swore never to cease till he had accomplished my brother's ruin and mine. He had never forgiven me for the attachment I had discovered for my brother's interest during the time he was in Poland and since.

Fortune chose to favour the King's animosity, for, during the seven months that my brother stayed in Gascony, he conceived a passion for Fosseuse, who was become the doting piece of the King my husband, as I have already mentioned, since he had quitted Rebours. This new passion in my brother had induced the King my husband to treat me with coldness, supposing that I countenanced my brother's addresses. I no sooner discovered this than I remonstrated with my brother, as I knew he would make every sacrifice for my repose. I begged him to give over his pursuit, and not to speak to her again. I succeeded this way to defeat the malice of my ill-fortune, but there was still behind another secret ambush, and that of a more fatal nature for Fosseuse, who was passionately fond of the King my husband, but had hitherto granted no favours inconsistent with prudence and modesty, piqued by his jealousy of my brother, gave herself up suddenly to his will, and unfortunately became pregnant. She no sooner made this discovery, than she altered her conduct towards me entirely from what it was before. She now shunned my presence as much as she had been accustomed to seek it, and whereas before she strove to do me every good office with the King my husband, she now endeavoured to make all the mischief she was able betwixt us. For his part, he avoided me he grew cold and indifferent, and since Fosseuse ceased to conduct herself with discretion the happy moments that we experienced during the four or five years we were together in Gascony, were no more.

Peace being restored, and my brother departed for France, as I have already related, the King my husband and I returned to Nérac. We were no sooner there than Fosseuse persuaded the King my husband to make a journey to the waters of Aigues-Caudes, in Béarn, perhaps with a design to rid herself of her burden there. I begged the King my husband to excuse my accompanying him, as, since the affront that I had received at Pau, I had made a vow never to set foot in Béarn until the Catholic religion was re-established there. He pressed me much to go with him, and grew angry at my persisting to refuse his request. He told me that his little girl (for so he affected to call Fosseuse) was desirous to go there on account of a colic, which she felt frequent returns of. I answered that I had no objection to his taking her with him. He then said that she could not go unless I went; that it would occasion scandal, which might as well be avoided. He continued to press me to accompany him, but at length I prevailed with him to consent to go without me, and to take her with him, and, with her, two of her companions, Rebours and Ville-Savin, together with the governess. They set out accordingly, and I waited their return at Bavière.

I had every day news from Rebours, informing me how matters went. This Rebours I have mentioned before to have been the object of my husband's passion, but she was now cast off, and consequently, was no friend to Fosseuse who had gained that place in his affection she had before held. She, therefore strove all she could to circumvent her and, indeed she was fully qualified for such a purpose, as she was a cunning, deceitful young person. She gave me to understand that Fosseuse laboured to do me every ill office in her power, that she spoke of me with the greatest disrespect on all occasions, and expressed her expectations of marrying the King herself in case she should be delivered of a son, when I was to be divorced. She had said, further that when the King my husband returned to Bavière, he had resolved to go to Pau and that I should go with him whether I would or not.

This intelligence was far from being agreeable to me, and I knew not what to think of it. I trusted in the goodness of God and I had a reliance on the generosity of the King my husband yet I passed the time I waited for his return but uncomfortably and often thought I shed more tears than they drank water. The Catholic nobility of the neighbourhood of Bavière used their utmost endeavours to divert my chagrin, for the month or five weeks that the King my husband and Fosseuse stayed at Aigues-Caudes

On his return, a certain nobleman acquainted the King my husband with the concern I was under lest he should go to Pau, whereupon he did not press me on the subject, but only said he should have been glad if I had consented to have gone with him there. Perceiving, by my tears and the expressions I made use of, that I should prefer even death to such a journey, he altered his intentions and we returned to Nérac.

Thé pregnancy of Fosseuse was now no longer a secret. The whole Court talked of it, and not only the Court, but all the country. I was willing to prevent the scandal from spreading, and accordingly resolved to talk to her on the subject. With this resolution, I took her into my closet, and spoke to her thus. "Though you have for some time estranged yourself from me, and, as it has been reported to me, striven to do me many ill offices with the King my husband, yet the regard I once had for you, and the esteem which I still entertain for those honourable persons to whose family you belong do not admit of my neglecting to afford you all the assistance in my power in your present unhappy situation I beg you, therefore, not to conceal the truth, it being both for your interest and mine, under whose protection you are, to declare it. Tell me the truth, and I will act towards you as a mother. You know that a contagious disorder has broken out in the place, and under pretence of avoiding it I will go to Mas d'Agenois, which is a house belonging to the King my husband, in a very retired situation. I will take you with me, and such other persons as you shall name. Whilst we are there the King will take the diversion of hunting in some other part of the country, and I shall not stir from thence before your delivery. By this means we shall put a stop to the scandalous reports which are now current, and which concern you more than myself."

So far from showing any contrition or returning thanks for my kindness, she replied, with the utmost arrogance, that she would prove all those to be liars who had reported such things of her that, for my part I had ceased for a long time to show her any marks of regard, and she saw that I was determined upon her ruin. These words she delivered in as loud a tone as mine had been mildly expressed, and, leaving me abruptly, she flew in a rage to the King my husband, to relate to him what I had said to her. He was very angry upon the occasion, and declared he would make them all liars who had laid such things to her charge. From that moment until the hour of her delivery, which was a few months after, he never spoke to me

She found the pains of labour come upon her about daybreak, whilst she was in bed in the chamber where the maids-of-honour slept. She sent for my physician, and begged him to go and acquaint the King my husband that she was taken ill. We slept in separate beds in the same chamber, and had done so for some time.

The physician delivered the message as he was directed, which greatly embarrassed my husband. What to do he did not know. On the one hand, he was fearful of a discovery; on the other, he foresaw that, without proper assistance, there was danger of losing one he so much loved. In this dilemma, he resolved to apply to me confess all, and implore my aid and advice, well knowing that, notwithstanding what had passed I should be ready to do him a pleasure. Having come to this resolution, he withdrew my curtains, and spoke to me thus "My dear, I have concealed a matter from you which I now confess I beg you to forgive me, and to think no more about what I have said to you on the subject. Will you oblige me so far as to rise and go to Fossense, who is taken very ill? I am well assured that, in her present situation, you will forget everything and resent nothing. You know how dearly I love her, and I hope you will comply with my request. I answered that I had too great a respect for him to be offended at anything he should do and that I would go to her immediately and do as much for her as if she were a child of my own. I advised him in the meantime, to go out and hunt, by which means he would draw away all his people, and prevent tattling.

I removed Fossense, with all convenient haste, from the chamber in which the maids of honour were, to one in a more retired part of the palace, got a physician and some women about her, and saw that she wanted for nothing that was proper in her situation. It pleased God that she should bring forth a daughter, since dead. As soon as she was delivered I ordered her to be taken back to the chamber from which she had been brought. Notwithstanding these precautions, it was not possible to prevent the story from circulating through the palace. When the King my husband returned from hunting he paid her a visit according to custom. She begged that I might come and see her, as was usual with me when any-one of my maids-of-honour was taken ill. By this means she expected to put a stop to stories to her prejudice. The King my husband came from her into my bed-chamber, and found me in bed, as I was fatigued and required rest, after having been called up so early. He begged me to get up and pay her a visit. I told him I went according to his desire before, when she stood in need of assistance, but now she wanted no help; that to visit her at this time would be only exposing her more, and cause myself to be pointed at by all the world. He seemed to be greatly displeased at what I said, which vexed me the more as I thought I did not deserve such treatment after what I had done at his request in the morning she likewise contributed all in her power to aggravate matters betwixt him and me.

In the meantime, the King my brother, always well informed of what is passing in the families of the nobility of his kingdom, was not ignorant of the transactions of our Court. He was particularly curious to learn everything that happened with us and knew every minute circumstance that I have now related. Thinking this a favourable occasion to wreak his vengeance on me for having been the means of my brother acquiring so much reputation by the peace he had brought about, he made use of the accident that happened in our Court to withdraw me from the King my husband, and thereby reduce me to the state of misery he wished to plunge me in. To this purpose he prevailed on the Queen my mother to write to me, and express her anxious desire to see me after an absence of five or six years. She added that a journey of this sort to Court would be serviceable to the affairs of the King my husband as well as my own, that the King my brother was himself desirous of seeing me, and that if I wanted money for the journey he would send it me. The King wrote to the same purpose, and despatched Manique, the steward of his household, with instructions to use every persuasion with me to undertake the journey. The length of time I had been absent in Gascony, and the unkind usage I received on account of Fosseuse, all contributed to induce me to listen to the proposal made me.

The King and the Queen both wrote to me. I received three letters, very shortly after each other, and, that I might have no pretence for staying, I had the sum of fifteen hundred crowns paid me to defray the expenses of my journey. The Queen my mother wrote that she would give me the meeting in Santonge, and that, if the King my husband would accompany me so far, she would treat with him there, and give him every satisfaction with respect to the King. But the King and she were desirous to have him at their Court, as he had been before with my brother; and the Marshal de Matignon had pressed the matter with the King, that he might have no one to interfere with him in Gascony I had had too long experience of what was to be expected at their Court to hope much from all the fine promises that were made to me. I had resolved, however, to avail myself of the opportunity of an absence of a few months, thinking it might prove the means of setting matters to rights. Besides which, I thought that, as I should take Fossense with me, it was possible that the King's passion for her might cool when she was no longer in his sight, or he might attach himself to some other that was less inclined to do me mischiefs.

It was with some difficulty that the King my husband would consent to a removal, so unwilling was he to leave his Fossense. He paid more attention to me in hopes that I should refuse to set out on this journey to France, but, as I had given my word in my letters to the King and the Queen my mother, that I would go, and as I had even received money for the purpose, I could not do otherwise.

And herein my ill fortune prevailed over the reluctance I had to leave the King my husband, after the instances of renewed love and regard which he had begun to show me

END OF THE MEMOIRS

Aigues, a small town having a hot mineral spring in Auvergne, 15 miles from St Flour, and about 300 miles south of Paris

ALENÇON

A large and beautiful city, which was formerly a duchy belonging to Lower Normandy, situated about 105 miles from Paris, south west in a fruitful country, watered by the Sarre. It has a castle well fortified and was esteemed a first rate town in Normandy. It now belongs to the Department of the Orne, of which it is the chief place. Its population is supposed to amount to 13,500 souls.

AMBOISE

A strong castle, built at a small town of the same name, which town was formerly the capital of Lower Touraine, situated on the confluence of the Loire and the Masse 110 miles south west of Paris. It was here that Louis XI instituted the Order of St Michael, in 1469. It is the birth place of Charles VIII and has been a residence, occasionally of the monarchs of France. Here, in 1560, was formed the famous conspiracy which bears the name of Amboise, against the Guises. According to the present division of France, it is in the Department of Indre-et Loire

D'ANGÉLY (SAINT-JEAN)

An ancient town, formerly of Saintonge, between 30 and 40 miles from Rochelle. It was besieged by the Count de la Rochefoucauld in 1562, who was obliged to raise the siege. It was afterwards taken by the Huguenots, and retaken by Henry III. in 1569, after a vigorous siege. The Huguenots again got possession of it, but Louis XIII., in 1621, rased the fortifications. According to the republican division of France, Saint-Jean-d'Angély belongs to the Department of the Lower Charente.

ANGERS.

A large city, formerly the capital of the Duchy of Anjou, built at some small distance from where the Loire and Sarthe empty themselves into the river Maine, about 200 miles south-west of Paris. Near it is a large quarry of slate stones. According to the new division of France into departments, it belongs to that of the Maine-et-Loire, of which it is the chief town. It has 30,000 inhabitants

AVIGNON

An ancient and large city in France, adjoining to that beautiful part of it lately called Provence, formerly belonging to the Pope, and, for the space of sixty-two years, the residence of the Popes then living from Clement V down to Gregory XI. It was purchased in 1348, of Joan, Queen of Sicily and Countess of Provence, together with the small territory round it called the Comtat de Venaissin. It has latterly been governed by a vice legate, who resided in the papal palace built by John XXII. It was a university and the seat of the tribunal of the Inquisition. It has many fine churches and the remains of a bridge over the Rhône, which passes under its walls. The French took possession of it in 1768, and on the extinction of the order of Jesuits, in 1774, gave it up again to the See of Rome. It is at present the chief town of the Department of Vaucluse, and computed to be 340 miles south of Paris. At the church of the Cordeliers, or Franciscan Friars, strangers visit the tomb of Laura, rendered famous to posterity by her lover Petrarch. The fountain of Vaucluse, which gives name to the department, supplies the river Sorgues, which runs through Avignon to mingle its waters with the Rhône.

‘It hath no trade that I could observe, says Roberts, an English merchant, in 1677. ‘though I have often been there. It is subject to the Pope, and he permitting Jews to inhabit here, they are found the principal pedlars, for merchants I cannot call them.

The city is said to have seven palaces, seven parishes, seven monasteries, seven nunneries, seven inns, and seven gates."

BAR-LE-DUC.

The capital of the former Duchy of Barrois, a considerable country in France, on both sides of the Meuse, betwixt Lorraine and Champagne. The House of Lorraine did homage for it to France, until it was ceded to that monarchy by the Treaty of the Pyrenees. At the Treaty of Ryswick it was restored to the House of Lorraine, and lastly, by a treaty dated in 1736, it was given to Stanislaus I, King of Poland, on condition that it should be restored to France at his death, which happened in 1766. Bar-le-Duc was built by a Duke of Lorraine, in the year 951, and has a handsome, but not strong castle. It is divided into the upper and lower town, in the former stands the ducal palace, the latter is washed by the little river Ornain, famous for its trout. The wines of Bar are excellent, and do not yield to those of Champagne. It is about 168 miles eastward of Paris. On account of the feudality of its addition (Le Duc) it is now called by the Republic of France Bar-sur-Ornain, and is the chief town of the Department of the Meuse. Its inhabitants are computed at 10,800.

BAYONNE, or BAIONNE

A very rich, strong and commercial city of France, formerly making part of the Government of Guienne. It has three castles with a citadel, and was principally fortified by Vauban. It is situated on the rivers Nive and Adour, at the distance of three miles from the sea. The entrance of the harbour is difficult, but vessels ride in it with safety. Bayonne is famous for its hams. It carries on a great trade in wool and other articles. That weapon, so decisive in battle, the bayonet, takes its name from this town. Bayonne is distant from Paris about 370 miles south west. According to the present division of France, it belongs to the Department of the Lower Pyrenees. The number of its inhabitants is computed to be some 11,000. The congress mentioned in these Memoirs took place in 1566, and the object of it is supposed to have been the extirpation of Huguenotism in France.

BÉARN

A province in France, and once a principality, bordering on Aragon, Gascony properly so-called and the Lower Armagnac, &c. It is included in the Department of the Lower Pyrenees of the present Republic of France. It was the patrimony of Henry King of Navarre, afterwards Henry the Great of France, who, during the civil wars, was called the Bernese. His son, Louis XIII., annexed it to the Crown of France in 1620. It is a mountainous country, and has mines of copper, lead and iron. The plains are fertile, but produce no other grain than millet and oats, on the hills are vineyards, which furnish plenty of wine of a most excellent quality. In 1695 the number of its inhabitants was estimated at 198,000. They are strong and active, industrious and sober, of quick parts, and selfish. They emigrate yearly in great numbers to work in Spain. Pau was formerly the capital of Béarn.

BLOIS.

An ancient and beautiful city, formerly the capital of the Blaisois, in the Generality of Orléans. It is pleasantly situated on the Loire, and has a magnificent castle, in which the Kings of France made their occasional residence. Henry Duke of Guise was killed here in 1588. The town has a number of beautiful fountains and a noble bridge. The inhabitants are polite and well-bred, and are said to speak the French tongue in its greatest perfection. Blois is about 150 miles south-west of Paris. It is at present the chief town in the Department of the Loire-et-Cher, and has 12,000 inhabitants.

BROUAGE

A handsome and strong town in France, formerly belonging to Saintonge, with a harbour Its salt works are the most considerable of the whole kingdom, and produce a great revenue It is situated near Bordeaux, and at the distance of about 300 miles south west of Paris

CAHORS

Was taken in 1581 (the first time that petards were ever used), and Henry carried the place, as his Queen has described, by assault, and with great loss. Cahors is situated upon the river Lot, which nearly surrounds it, and is neither considerable for its size nor buildings. At the time Margaret wrote her Memoirs it was the capital of Querci, in the Generality of Montauban and a bishopric, a suffragan of Albi. There are remaining the ruins of an amphitheatre, which show it to have been a town of great antiquity It had a university, founded in 1332, but suppressed in 1751 The Viscount de Cossac is a vassal to the bishop, and when the latter takes possession of the see, the vassal is bound to the following singular service. He is to wait for the bishop at the gates of the town bare headed, without his cloak, and with one leg and foot naked, except a slipper. In this dress he is to take the bridle of the mule on which the bishop rides, and lead on to the episcopal palace. He is afterwards to wait on the bishop at dinner, habited in the same manner, and for this service he claims the bishop's mule and his sideboard of plate, both of which were commuted for 3,000 livres, money to be paid. But this feudal custom is done away by the Revolution in France, and Cahors is now the chief town of the Department of Lot. It is distant 390 miles south of Paris, and has 10,000 inhabitants.

CAMBRAY.

A very fair, large and strong city of the Low Countries, the capital of what was formerly the Cambresis. Margaret speaks of it as if it was no more than a bishopric, but, according to Vosgien, it was, as early as 1559, made the seat of an archbishop, with the title of Duke. Charles V built the citadel and fort. It was taken from the Spaniards by the King of France in 1677, and confirmed to that Crown by the Treaty of Nimeguen, to which it belonged to the time of the Revolution. The city is of great antiquity, it being the principal seat of the Roman colonies in this country. The Scheldt runs through the city and divides it into two parts. It is distant about 120 miles to the north of Paris, and is now reckoned in the Department of the Nord. Its population amounts to 15,000 souls.

CASTELNAUDARY

A considerable town in the former province of Languedoc, the capital then of Lauraguais. It is situated on a small eminence near the canal, in a country which produces a great deal of wheat-corn. It is 450 miles southward of Paris, and, by the new division of France, is in the Department of the Aude (so named from a river), of which the chief town is Carcassonne.

CHASTELET

This place, which Margaret has called Chastelet, is Le Catelt, situated in the province formerly called Picardy. It stands, as Margaret has here described it, at the distance, according to Vosgien of four leagues south of Cambray or about 12 English miles. That author describes it as a small town in the former province of Picardy. The Spaniards took it in 1557, since which it has been taken and retaken. It is situated 12 miles south of Cambray. Picardy is entirely included in the Department of the Aisne, from a river so called.

DINANT

A town once belonging to the late principality of Liège, but, since the French Revolution, included in the Department of Sambre-et-Meuse. It has been built since the sixth century. It was taken by the French in 1554 and in 1675, but was restored to the Bishop of Liège, by the Peace of Ryswick, in 1697. Its fortifications were demolished in 1703. It has but one principal street, and its territory is much narrowed by a high mountain, on which stood a castle. In 1466 it was taken by assault by Philip Duke of Burgundy, after a stout defence, when nearly all its inhabitants were either killed or drowned. It stands near the river Meuse, on the right bank, and has a stone bridge over it. The country about it produces marble and iron ore. It is situated 36 miles south-west of Liège, 15 miles south-east of Namur, and 45 miles south-east of Mons.

DREUX.

The battle of Dreux was fought on December 19th, 1562, when the Huguenots were defeated, and the Prince of Condé, their chief, was made prisoner. The Prince of Navarre (afterwards Henry IV.) was present, though only nine years old, and his remarks upon the misconduct of the conquered army are recorded for their acuteness. A sermon was preached there until late in the last century on the anniversary of this defeat, which is mentioned here as one amongst the innumerable instances of the prejudices of party Dreux is an ancient town of the late Isle of France, but now included in the Department of Eure et Loire. Henry IV took this town in 1593 It has a considerable manufactory for coarse cloths, fit for army clothing It is situated about 50 miles west of Paris.

BAUSE

Is a small, but very old town, in what was called Gascony, and a favourite situation of the Romans, now included in the Department of Gers, so called from a river running through it of the same name, which empties itself into the Garonne below Agen

HUY

A town belonging formerly to the Principality of Liège but which, since the French Revolution is included in the Department of Ourthe, of which Liège is the chief town. It had once a castle, which is now in ruins, and has a handsome bridge over the Meuse. It was taken by the French in 1693 and retaken by the confederates the year following It was taken again from the French, 1703, by the confederate army under the Duke of Marlborough, retaken by the French in 1705, and again repossessed by the confederates in the same year. It is about 14 miles south of Liège, and nearly 17 miles north-east of Namur

ISSOIRE.

An ancient small town, in the Government of Lyonnais and Lower Auvergne, according to the old order of things, but, by the present new disposition, making a part of the Puy-de-Dôme, so called from a mountain of that name. It was besieged and taken by the Duke of Alençon in 1577, which is mentioned in these Memoirs of Margaret, and by Henry IV. in 1590. It stands on the river Couze, 270 miles southward of Paris

JARNAC.

The battle of Jarnac was fought March 13th, 1569, when Henry Duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III., defeated the Huguenots. Jarnac is a considerable village, in what was formerly styled the Angoumois, but now included in the Department of the Charente. It stands on the river Charente, south-by-east of Paris about 300 miles.

LA FÈRE.

A small town, in the late province of Picardy, but now included in the Department of the Aisne, so called from a river, agreeably to the present new order of things in France. It was remarkable for a school of artillery, and a manufactory of gunpowder. It stands on the rivers Serre and Oise distant from Paris about 90 miles north by-east.

LIÈGE,

By the Germans called Lunck or Luyck, and Luttig (in Latin Leodium, Legia, Leodicum), is a populous and large city, with a considerable territory, formerly making part of Germany and belonging to the circle of Westphalia, the seat of a bishop, who was a Prince of the Empire, and a suffragan of Cologne but, since the French Revolution, it is become the chief town of the Department of Ourthe, thus called from the name of a river which joins the Meuse at this place. This bishopric was transferred hither from Tongres by St. Hubert in the year 709. Before the late Revolution, it was a kind of republic, governed by the prince, bishop, and the states of the country belonging to it in which liberty, as far as consistent with good order, was enjoyed by stranger as well as native, under a mild and equitable popular government. The bishops were chosen from amongst the canons belonging to the cathedral, consisting of sixty in number, all of them noble, either by birth or patent of creation. It was a free, imperial city, and had a university. In 1691 it was bombarded, and in 1701 its bishop delivered it up to the French, from whom the Allies recovered it in the year following. In 1705 it was in danger of being taken by the French, but the Duke of Marlborough relieved it by a forced march. By the Treaty of Baden, in 1714, it was restored to the prince-bishop. Notwithstanding the size of this city and its suburbs, its population was never estimated at more than 100,000 souls. Its foreign trade is considerable, chiefly in arms and other ironware, coals, hops, marble, lime, sulphur, alum, beer, &c, the produce of its mines and soil. The churches and public buildings of Liège are remarkable for neatness and beauty, the bridges and public conduits are magnificent. The quays, extending along the Meuse, are planted with trees, having a charming effect. The city itself stands in a large and fertile valley, and has the river Meuse entering it in two branches, accompanied with lesser streams, which form many delightful islands. Liège is about 30 miles north east of Namur, 70 east of Mons, and about 210 north east of Paris

LYONS

A large, famous, strong and rich city, the second in France, the capital of Lyonnais, according to the ancient disposition, but agreeably to the present order of things, the chief town of the Department of the Rhône. It was founded by the Roman consul, Lucius Minncius Plancus forty-one years before the birth of Christ. It stands on the river Rhône, where the Saône meets and joins it, and which river, like a wife loses its own name and takes its husband's, both being then known only by the name of Rhône till they reach the Mediterranean Sea. The history and curiosities of Lyons form volumes. It will be sufficient here to mention its fine square called the Belle Cour its former Hôtel de Ville, now it is presumed, styled the Municipality House, and the two hospitals of La Charité and Hôtel Dieu, the most commodious and the cleanest perhaps, in Europe. Over the Saône there are many bridges that thrown over the Rhône is 260 toises, or 550 yards in length. Its trade consists chiefly in manufactures of silk gold and silver stuffs laces, &c. in which its merchants deal very extensively. It is 120 miles north of Avignon and nearly 230 south of Paris. The number of its inhabitants is computed to be 160,000.

MAS-D'AGENOIS.

A little town on the river Garonne, at the distance of 3 miles from Marmande, a city of some trade, 36 miles from Bordeaux.

METZ.

An ancient and considerable city of France, once imperial, in the country formerly called Messin, a bishopric under the archbishop of Triers, the bishop of it taking the title of Prince of the Holy Roman Empire, and formerly the residence of a parliament, with a citadel, now the chief town of the Department of the Moselle. In 1552 this city put itself under the protection of Henry II and was confirmed to the Crown of France by the Treaty of Westphalia. The Emperor Charles V. besieged it in 1552 with a large army, but the town being well defended by Henry Duke of Guise, the Emperor thought proper to raise the siege and withdraw his forces. The cathedral is esteemed the finest in France. The canons were all noblemen, and since 1777 had the privilege of having a cross borne before them. The Jews have a particular part of the city assigned them, with a synagogue. Metz was supposed to contain 26,000 inhabitants, but, according to another computation, 40,000. In 1760 a royal society was established here for the cultivation of the arts and sciences. It is situated on the confluence of the Moselle and Seille, over which rivers it has two handsome bridges. It is about 200 miles to the eastward of Paris. Betwixt Metz and Pont à Mousson, at a small distance from the former, are the remains of a Roman aqueduct which was carried over the Moselle from one mountain to another and called the Pont Jovy, from the village near it. The country people of the neighbourhood supposed it to be a real bridge, and the work of the devil.

This city must not be confounded with Mentz, or Mayence, a great town in Germany, at which the art of printing was first discovered and used in 1440.

MONCONTOUR.

A town in France, in the Mirebalais, formerly making a part of Poitou, and now belonging to the Department of the Vendée, the two Sèvres, or Vienne, all names of rivers. Poitou, being a large province, made three divisions of the eighty three into which France was parcelled out by the constituting or first assembly after the Revolution. At Moncontour Henry III. defeated the Admiral Coligny in October, 1569. It lies south-west of Paris about 190 miles.

MONS.

An ancient, strong and handsome city in the Low Countries, at the time of these Memoirs the capital of Austrian Hainault, but now the chief town of the Department of Jemappes. It was taken by the Duke of Alva in 1572, and by Louis XIV. in 1691. The Allies took it in 1705, after which, by the Peace of Utrecht, it was given to the House of Austria, the French took it again on the 10th of July, 1746, and it was restored to Austria by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. It stands on the river Trouille, surrounded by marshes. The town is built on very uneven ground, from whence it derives its name. It is situated 21 miles from Valenciennes and 160 from Paris, both of them to the north-east

MONTAUBAN

A fine, rich city of France, formerly the capital of Quercy, and a generalty. It has been the see of a bishop, the suffragan of Toulouse, since the year 1317, and is now included in the Department of the Lot, of which Cahors is the chief town. The cathedral is a modern edifice, and is a very beautiful building. The quay of Foncault, or Falaise, is a public walk esteemed very handsome. The bishop's palace and the conduit, named Griffon, are remarkable structures. The inhabitants of Montauban, in 1572, declared themselves to be Huguenots, and fortified their town. Louis XIII, son of Henry IV, laid siege to it in 1621, which he was obliged to raise. In 1629 the town submitted, and Cardinal Richelieu, who conducted the affairs of France at that time, caused the fortifications to be levelled with the ground. In 1752 a literary academy was established in this city. It is divided into three parts, the old town and the new, with Bourbon, which is separated from the former two by the river Tarn. It is distant from Paris 420 miles south, and about 30 miles from Cahors. Its population amounts to 20,000 souls.

NAMUR.

A strong, rich, and large city, with a noble castle, in the Netherlands, and formerly the capital of the county of the same name, but at present the chief town of the Department of the Sambre et Meuse, on the confluence of which rivers it stands. The cathedral, which was begun in 1750, is a handsome building, as are the churches lately belonging to the Recollects and Jesuits. Louis XIV. took this city in 1692, three years after which it was retaken by William III. and the Allies. It was again bombarded by the French, and taken, in 1704, and, in 1713, restored to the House of Austria, when, by the Barrier Treaty, it was committed to the keeping of the States-General. In 1746 the French took it again; it was afterwards restored to the House of Austria, and the Dutch garrisons were to evacuate that city, and the others which they held in pursuance of the Barrier Treaty, in the year 1782. It is situated nearly 36 miles south-west of Liège, 37 miles east of Mons, 18 miles south-west of Huy, and 15 miles north-west of Dinant.

NAVARRÉ.

A small kingdom, bordering on Spain, divided into two parts, called the Upper and the Lower Navarre. Upper Navarre belongs to Spain, and is bounded by the Pyrenean mountains, having an extent of about 90 miles in length and 70 miles in breadth. It is now one of the finest provinces in Spain, and has roads cut through the mountains with prodigious labour. The air of this province is reckoned the best and purest of all Spain, and, although it is covered with mountains, the soil of it is nevertheless fertile. It abounds with game, and has several iron mines. The natives are polite, lively, and industrious, and do not want an acuteness of genius for the sciences or political affairs. Navarre is governed by a Viceroy, and enjoys very particular privileges. It is divided into five districts, the capitals of which are, Pampeluna, Estella, Tudella, Olita, and Sanguesa. Lower Navarre now belongs to France, and is separated from the Upper by the Pyrenees, and now is included in the two departments named from these mountains. Contrary to the Upper Navarre, the Lower is mountainous and sterile. Louis XIII. as the heir of his grandmother Joan d'Albret, united the Lower Navarre and Béarn to the Crown of France in 1620. The domain of Navarre extended to Bordeaux and Toulouse, both of which cities had their parliaments. The Lower Navarre extended 24 miles in length and 15 miles in breadth.

NÉRAC.

A handsome city, in the province formerly called Gascony, in the Condomois belonging to the Government of Guienne and Generality of Bordeaux, now included in the Department of the Lot et Garonne. It was formerly the chief city of a duchy belonging to Albret, King of Navarre, who, with the rest of the Sovereigns of Navarre, made his residence in it. During the sixteenth century, the Huguenots are said to have exercised horrid cruelties here. However, it appears from Peter Eisenberg's "Travels through France," quoted by Martin Zeiller, in his "Reisebeschreibung durch Frankreich," 1674, that there was a court of justice here (chambre-mixte), the judges of which were half Huguenots and half Catholics; from which we may conclude the Huguenots became latterly more moderate than Vosgien has represented them in the last sentence taken from his "Géographie Universelle." The river Baise, which, by the means of sluices, is rendered navigable to this city, divides it into two parts, called Great and Little Nérac. Here, as mentioned by Margaret in her Memoirs, the King of Navarre had a magnificent castle, adorned with gardens and walks of cypress, laurel, and pomegranate trees. Jodocus Sincerus, who wrote an "Itinerarium Galliæ" from his own observations in his travels through France, printed at Amsterdam in 1649, says he was shown there a large and flourishing cypress tree, which was planted by the hands of Henry IV., an omen of his future greatness. Nérac is 55 miles south-east of Bordeaux, and nearly 450 miles south by west of Paris

PAU

A beautiful little city, formerly the capital of Béarn, and the seat of a parhament, but now the chief town of the Department of the Lower Pyrenees. It has a castle famous as the place where Henry IV was born, on December 13th, 1557 Its population is reckoned to amount to 9,000 souls.

PLESSIS-LES-TOURS

A royal residence, built by Louis XI, and the place where he died in 1483 It stands near Tours, in a pleasant situation (See Tours in these Notes.)

POISSI, or POISSY

A small but ancient town, in what was lately called the Isle of France, now included in the Department of Seine et Oise It is situated near the Forest of Saint Germain, on the left bank of the Seine, about 18 miles distant from Paris. It is famous for the assembly held there concerning the points of religion in dispute betwixt the Catholics and the Protestants, called, in those Memoirs, the Colloques, Colloquy or Conference, of Poissy It was the residence of the Kings of France, and the birth place of Saint Louis

POITIERS.

A very large and considerable city of France, formerly in the Generality of Orléanais, the metropolis of the Province of Poitou, a bishopric and suffragan of the Archbishop of Bordeaux, and a celebrated university; but, since the Revolution, it is become the chief town of the Department of Vienne, from a river of that name. The city is ill-built, and not inhabited in proportion to its extent. It had fifteen parishes and a great number of convents. There are, in and near it, many remains of buildings of great antiquity, particularly a palace said to have been built by the Emperor Gallienus, and a triumphal arch, which serves as a gate. In the middle of the square, once called the Place Royale, stood a pedestrian statue of Louis XIV. It is famous for a battle fought between our renowned Black Prince and the French under King John, in the year 1356, in which John was taken prisoner, and afterwards brought to England. It is situated on a rising ground, watered by the river Clain, 63 miles distant from Tours, and about 220 miles south-west of Paris.

RÉOLE (LA)

A small town on the right bank of the Garonne, 24 miles south-east of Bordeaux.

RHEIMS

A very ancient, great, fine and populous city of France. Before the Revolution it was the metropolis of the Generality of Champagne, the see of an archbishop, who was the first duke and peer of France, and a university town but by the changes brought about by that event, it became a part of the Department of the Marne. Here the Kings of France were anointed, an office claimed exclusively by the archbishop. It has a large square, in which was erected a statue of Louis XV. The cathedral was built in the thirteenth century and is esteemed the most perfect model of Gothic architecture in the whole kingdom and according to some, in all Europe. The portal is greatly admired by the curious. It stands in a plain surrounded by hills, and produces wine of a most excellent quality and is watered by the river Vesle at the distance of 100 miles north east of Paris. Its population is computed at 31,000 souls.

SAINT-GERMAINS, OR SAINT GERMAIN EN
LAYE.

A handsome town, formerly making part of the Isle of France, but now included in the Department of the Seine-et-Oise. It has been a residence of the Kings of France, many of whom have, from time to time, made additions to it. It is remarkable for having been the place of retreat assigned to our James II. when he abdicated these kingdoms, and here it was he died. Louis XIV. was born there, September 5th, 1638. The palace is much admired for its beautiful situation and prospects, its delightful gardens and noble forest. It stands on the Seine, 12 miles north-west of Paris

SAINTONGE.

A former province of France, now comprehended in the Department of the Lower Charente, a river which, running north and south, divides it into two parts. The soil produces wine, corn and fruits in abundance. Salt is produced there. The breed of horses is much admired and valued

SENS

An ancient and beautiful city of France, formerly belonging to the Government of Champagne and the metropolis of Sénénais, the see of an archbishop, who assumed the title of Primate of the Gauls and Germany, but now included in the Department of Yonne. The city is not peopled in proportion to its size, though well situated for trade, in the midst of a fine, fertile country, and on the confluence of the rivers Vanne and Yonne. It stands about 60 miles south-east of whilst he was ambassador from France to King James, and, being found equally good as if fresh from the well, it has been an article of importation ever since. The virtues of these waters are more particularly explained by the celebrated Hoffman who first established the practice of analysis of mineral springs, and after him by our countryman, Dr Shaw, in his "Observations on Medicinal Waters."

TOULOUSE

A very ancient and large city, and the most considerable one in France. It belonged to the former province of Languedoc, and was itself a county an archbishop's see, and celebrated university. According to the revolutionary division into Departments, it is the chief town of that of the Upper Garonne. The town house, or Hôtel de Ville, was called the Capitol, and the consuls were styled Capitouls. This city is not peopled in proportion to its size, and, though well situated for trade, has but a small share of it. It stands on the right bank of the Garonne over which is a handsome bridge, near the end of the Canal of Languedoc. It is distant from Paris about 450 miles west. The number of its inhabitants is computed to be 56 000.

TOURS

A fair, large, and rich city of France, formerly belonging to the Government of Orléanais and the metropolis of the Duchy of Touraine, an archbishop's see, and a general city, but now the chief town of the Department of the Indre-et-Loire. It had heretofore a chapter of nobles, dedicated to Saint Martin, to which the Kings of France, from time immemorial, belonged, an abbot and premier canon. The church belonging to this illustrious chapter is esteemed one of the largest in France. There is likewise a cathedral, belonging to which is a library filled with manuscripts. The city carries on a considerable trade in silks manufactured here. It is situated in a beautiful plain between the Cher and the Loire, over which last river a bridge was constructed in 1777, part of which fell in as soon as finished. It is distant from Paris about 150 miles south-west. Its population amounts to 21,600 inhabitants.

In addition to the description which Margaret has given of the following place, the reader will not be displeased at finding an account of its present state.

VALENCIENNES.

An ancient strong and considerable city and county in the Netherlands: formerly the metropolis of French